"IN THE AISLES OF THE WILD" (Biograph), Oct. 14.—The Biograph Company's work shows pre-eminently artistic construction; the choice of incident in its picture is good. The action is nearly always significant of human things and nearly always it is carried forward with a sweep. Biograph weakness shows itself in the relief. When the picture is nearly all tragic we are not moved deeply. It gets a strong hold when some contrast deepens the picture by relieving the tragic cloud as against the eternal calm, the blue sky of life. There are psychological reasons for this. The picture before us was taken in a lovely forest country and the camera has caught some perfect views of it. The main thread is played by Claire McDowell and Henry Walthall with a second man, a very competent player. The secondary story, whose purpose was solely relief, is carried by a young player who wasn't quite up to it. As a whole, it makes a striking picture; but it deals almost wholly with passion and never reaches the deeper human interest. The worst that can be said of it is that it wasn't a very happy choice for a silent drama. It will astonish more than please.

"THE CRINGER" (Lubin), Oct. 12.—He is an old acquaintance, this cringer. Everyone maltreats him in the first act, and in the third he does something desperate "to prove" he isn't afraid. The character is interesting and fairly convincing; but the sketch gives us but a shallow view of human life; it is not a picture of courage. Courage has its foundation in wisdom and there is no wisdom and nothing that is commendable in this deed of the cringer. It convinces because of this very fact; the man is a cringer even to the bitter end. The picture has value as a side light on life and it suggests thoughts. In this case, the backgrounds are very interesting and the portrayal of the central character by Romaine Fielding is extremely competent.

"WHEN CALIFORNIA WAS YOUNG" (Vitagraph), Oct. 12.—A tragic love story, not new in either background or in outline; but filled in skillfully by intelligent actors whom we have never seen play this situation before. The author is Robert T. Thornby and the producer, Rollin S. Sturgeon. Earle Willions plays the poor Spanish lover whose sweetheart is stolen from him by a better dressed man, a wealthy official and who becomes a monk. The girl is played by Mary Charleson and Robert Thornby plays the man who marries and then maltreats the girl. It has good historical atmosphere; but gives us very little that is new.

"EVERY INCH A MAN" (Vitagraph), Oct. 14.—Wm. Wallace Reid has given us a good, fresh comedy in this little sketch. It shows a raw youth from the West who wants to be a detective. The city sleuths to scare him put up a game on him; but reckon without knowing their man. He brings them in tied up and the laugh is not on the boy. Hal Reid plays the boy's father; Rose Tapley, his mother. Robert Gaillord, Morris McGee and Frank Mason also have parts. It was produced by Wm. Humphrey. A good offering.

"MRS. LIRRIPER'S LODGERS" (Vitagraph), Oct. 15.—Mr. Van Dyke Brooke, who produced this picture, an adaptation of a chapter from Dickens by W. A. Tremayne, and who also plays an important role in it, has made a thoroughly delightful offering, full of the real Dickens' atmosphere and full of old-time courtliness. Mrs. Mary Maurice plays Mrs. Lirriper and her work and her kindly face are too well known to need further comment. She fills the part of this very human boarding house keeper in a very pleasing way. Clara K. Young plays Mr. Edson, whom her worthless husband (Courtney Foote) abandons at Mrs. Lirriper's. Van D. Brooke plays Major Jackman. It is surely a fine offering and its humanity and heart-interest pleased a large audience.

"THE UPRISING" (Lubin), Oct. 14.—The producer of this Indian picture has given us something quite fresh and new in method. Neither chase nor battle hold the chief place in it; but faces. The effect is to give a strong impression of realism. The picture seems a dream, a hideous nightmare; the spectators get what is in the heart of the lonely men up in the mountains with a live baby to protect; but with mystery all around him. Quite terrible it is and this part of the production cannot be too highly praised. The love scenes, we don't like so well. One scene, in particular, a vision of a cross, seems wholly out of place and is not understood. As a whole, it is a very desirable picture, something quite out of the ordinary.

"GLIMPSES OF BERMUDA" (Edison), Oct. 15.—Among other good things in this scenic film are some perfect views of the bottom of the sea, showing aquatic flowers and ferns. It is very good.

Independent

"EARLY DAYS IN THE WEST" (Bison-Universal), Oct. 19.—A two-reel picture of action. Its story is presented so clearly that sub-titles are not needed. This is partly because the action is along familiar lines and the spectator already knows all that is needed about the characters. There is a good Indian portrayal in it. The redskin himself is far from good; he is very much alive and is the real hero of the story. Several other very attractive things will be found in the picture that will help in its popular appeal. In a wide country, a large immigrant train is attacked by as numerous a band of Indians. One of the white men breaks through and warns the soldiers at the fort, who effect a rescue at the critical moment. This messenger puts the Indians who are following him on the wrong trail by one of the cleverest ruses in pictures. It is absolutely convincing as shown, and in it his well trained horse has a prominent part. Where pictures of the early West are popular, this offering will rank high.

"THE HOODOO LETTER" (Eclair), Oct. 15.—The idea of this picture is not wholly new; but there is much freshness in the way it is used and it gives good entertainment and laughter. The ending chase is weak; but all the rest of it is fine. The tramp, who can't read and brashly steals a letter saying that he can't work (it says he has smallpox) and then goes out to beg, is very well pictured.

"ONE ON JONES" (Eclair), Oct. 15.—On the same reel. Jones is played by a good comedian and that means much in picturing an old situation. Let us hasten to add that, although the situation is old, it is worked out in a very fresh and a very laughable way and makes good fun. The two on the same reel go very well.

"TAMING A BACHELOR" (Comet), October 14.—A picture that is made pleasing by the players who act it. The situation is good; it has some dramatic quality; but it is not deeply significant, nor is it convincing as a bit of real life. It has value as a lightener on a program.

"A SECTION OF NEW YORK CITY'S NEW WATER TUNNEL" (Comet), October 14.—On the same reel is this very short filler. To New York audience it will be especially acceptable.

"THE DOUBLE DEBT" (Comet), October 12.—In many ways this is a beautiful picture; but it is confused by many characters and the main incident has been used in almost the same way at least once before. It is only possible to unravel the story by the closest attention to its faces; and without that attention, one is likely to lose it altogether. On this account we fear to commend it highly as entertainment.

"WHEN MERCY TEMPERS JUSTICE" (Thanhouser), October 15.—A fantasy presented as the dream of a judge. It has the fine qualities happily often found in offerings by Thanhouser. Containing, as it does, a plea for an equal justice to poor and to rich alike, and being presented in a wholesome, even-tempered way that never irritates, we commend it as a thoroughly worthy picture. Besides this, it will rank high as entertainment; for it is a well acted and gracefully conducted picture. Miss Anderson plays the wife and mother in the poverty-stricken family. One of her two little girls is the Thanhouser kid. The father, who snatches a bottle of milk to keep his kiddies from starvation, is Mr. Cruze, while Mr. Russell is the judge who has favored a rich thief and condemned a poor man. Miss Flo La Badie plays, with her usual grace, the Spirit of Justice, who comes to rebuke the Judge in his dream.

"FOR THE MIKADO" (Thanhouser), October 18.—Miss Taku Takagi, the graceful Japanese player, takes the lead in this heroic melodrama, as a girl who sacrifices her life that the Mikado's army may get plans of a Russian fort. Her husband had been detailed to get the plans; but at the critical moment he was intoxicated and she had to take his place. She is wounded by a sentry; but manages, not only to escape, but to delay the search long enough for her husband to get away with the papers. The early scenes, set in Japan, are marvelously like the real thing not only in backgrounds but in atmosphere including acting and conduct of the story. The Russian scenes are small, narrow views; but are very suggestive of Russia. It is a commendable offering, out of the ordinary in atmosphere, clear and thrilling in its story, and very pretty. Wm. Bowman plays the Mikado. The Russian traitor is played by Wm. Russell and the Russian secret service agent by Virginia Nardon.

"THE SIMPLER LIFE" (Majestic), October 13.—A romance in a village grocery. There are other sets and backgrounds; but the story centers mostly around the cans and the boxes. The idea, and most of the filling-in, too, is delightfully fresh and it makes a worthy, wholesome picture that can be highly commended. Its author, J. Russell O'Leary, is to be congratulated. Indeed, it is one of the most interesting pictures that we have seen this week. Anna Lehr plays an engaging part as the village grocer's daughter. Mr. Scardon plays the tired millionaire who, as a poor man, gets a job in the grocery. Mr. Wm. Lemp plays a rural comedy part.

"ALL FOR JIM" (Majestic), October 15.—A picture by Herbert Prior who plays the lead in it (an ambitious workman) with Mabel Trunnelle as his wife. She overworks herself at home, taking in sewing, so that Jim can go to night school, where he flirts with another girl. At length, she loses her sight temporarily; but his eyes are opened. It has a pleasant ending and, as a naturally acted, realistic story, should be generally acceptable. A very fair offering.

"THE BORDER DETECTIVE" (American), October 16.—A picture whose climax is the capture of opium smugglers on the border. It is a very poorly conducted picture, complicated and obscure. There is no clearly told story and the incidents are apt to show amateurishness; some of them will provoke a laugh. It is a mistake, we feel sure, to release such.

"THE NEW COWPUNCHER" (American), October 17.—The ranch hero and villain appear again in this offering in ways that have a slight but significant difference and furnish much freshness to an old story. It is an offering, in quality like others by the Flying A premier company. Richardson is the villain, Miss Pauline Bush the ranch owner's daughter and Kerrigan the new cowpuncher. It will furnish entertainment to most spectators, and it is safe to commend it.

"THE COTTON INDUSTRY" (Gaumont), October 12.—A picture taken in New England. It is very well photographed and shows the care and treatment of crude cotton and its spinning. We see the kind of work that girls in the factories have to do and we see the different processes in the making of thread and cloth. It is a very instructive and interesting picture, dealing with a subject that nearly everyone has heard much about.

"REUNION DAYS IN ELI TOWN" (Gaumont), October 12.—On the same reel is an extensive picture of the military and civic parade recently held in New Haven. All Yale men, and everyone else for that, will find it interesting.

"BEETHOVEN" (Gaumont), October 15.—A dignified picture full of much that is beautiful and (this is the best thing in it) the leading role is reverently and effectively acted by a first rate player. A grandly tragic story of the deaf composer has been grandly portrayed. It is a picture for cultivated spectators. The dream scenes that illustrate the symphonies are very inadequate, of course. They will probably displease true music lovers; but the scenes that suggest the closing-in of deafness, and the last scenes, especially that in which is symbolically shown the glory of his last great symphony, that his mortal ears never heard, are strong and emotional. We like this picture very much and a good sized audience that saw it with us seemed to be impressed by it.

"GAUMONT WEEKLY, NO. 31."—A well balanced and vitally interesting number.

"A FOOL AND HIS MONEY" (Solax), October 11.—A picture of colored people played by real colored actors. It features James Russell, the cake walk king of America, as Sam Jones, who finds a purse and is rich for a time. It's a love story with good darky comedy, human and fresh. There is a darky evening reception and dance that is something quite new. We think that it will please everywhere where any picture of darkies would be acceptable and commend it as a first rate offering.

"CANNED HARMONY" (Solax), October 9.—A farcical romance. The musician (Lee Beggs) dislikes the lover (Billy Quirk) of his daughter (Blanche Cornwall) because he lacks musical skill and Paderewski curls. After a few painful adventures, some of which were cleverly adapted from the works of William Shakespeare, Billy, with the help of Darwin Karr, his friend, gets the curls, a wig of 'em, and the skill, as much as a phonograph can give him. He wins his bride with her happy father's consent. The offering is lively, it will be found amusing and will be acceptable on a bill with more substantial offerings.

"THE PEDDLER'S FIND" (Reliance), October 12.—A picture showing the rise in life of a very poor Jewish peddler who has rescued a blind baby and brought her to his already overcrowded home. She brings good luck. The picture does not grow dramatic until near the end, when the peddler, now rich, doesn't like to have his son, now a doctor, marry the girl, and merely because she is not a Jewess. This end is pretty; but it doesn't convince. The theme, especially that of the first part of the picture, is fine; but poor photography mars it. It lacks strength; but has some of the qualities of popularity. A fair offering; many uncritical people will like it.

"THE SERGEANT'S BOY" (Bison 101, N. Y. M. P. Co.), October 11.—A two reel picture, opening with a rush of Indians on a cabin. The capture of the boy, his rescue by the troops and adoption by the sergeant are stated in a skillfully pictured whirl of turmoil, dust and battle. A few years are now skipped and we find the lad grown up, a private soldier. The picture tells a garrison love story, new in films, and its climax fittingly is also a whirl of dust and war. The sergeant's boy has proved himself a hero and is buried, after a very emotional scene, with the honors of a soldier. Some will weep over it and it will be liked everywhere. A very desirable release.

"AN INDIAN LEGEND" (Broncho), October 9.—A story told to tourists by an Indian guide and giving the reason why "Ghost Lake" is haunted by the wraith of an Indian girl. Such stories are more effectively pictured when the narrator is kept in view. This is troublesome to do; but it has been done. It has a good story for a picture; but the fact that it was told to tourists weakens it just a little with a sense of unreality. In the legend a white man turns from an Indian girl with whom he had flirted and marries a white girl, a new-comer to the settlement. The Indian girl disappears and her tribe attack and wipe out the settlement. The Indian girl comes into the picture again; kisses the lifeless body of her white lover and then walks into the lake. As an offering, the picture ranks well, it having much prettiness and plenty of action.

"PEDRO'S DILEMMA" (Keystone), October 7.—A split reel. Pedro is played by Mack Sennett, who makes a very comical Mexican lover, passionate enough, but nervous and eccentric. His chosen sweetheart (Mabel Normand) sends him a note proposing an elopement. Mabel's friend (Virginia Fordé) under a veil marries him. Mabel's father follows and makes Mack glad that it's Virginia and not Mabel. It is a sure laugh-maker and, with the following, the film makes an excellent light offering.

"THE BEATING HE NEEDED" (Keystone), October 7.—On the same reel. This subject, the sissy cowby, has been used a number of times; but we find it so cleverly handled here that we believe it the best picture of its kind. It is very amusing; there is nothing offensive in it, and it ought to be generally acceptable.

"THE OLD SWEETHEART" (Imp), October 14.—Jane Fearnley plays the lead in this drama which has for its prime motive a jilted suitor's reverence for an old sweetheart. Both the rivals are well depicted. Jack, who has been rejected for drinking, and who goes from bad to worse, afterward is admirably presented in his scheming for revenge on a quarrymaster who refuses him a job. The humor in the final situation leaves a pleasant flavor. The scene in which Jack finds his old sweetheart has a splendid dramatic quality. As a whole the film gets over in good shape.

"PATSY'S MISTAKE" (Nestor), October 16.—This comedy was produced from the idea that twins, even when they mature into extremely large women, look very much alike and may be mistaken for one another when, after a separation as children, they meet again by chance as grown ups in the same town. The basic idea is an old one, but it has been developed here with an original viewpoint and some novel turns which make the story refreshingly new and interesting. Patsy, who has the good fortune of marrying one of the twins and the bad fortune of mistaking the other for his wife, is a good comic character. The probabilities are not strained in the succeeding entanglements, and little by-plays skillfully introduced from time to time are very successful. The production will win a laugh in any playhouse.

"GOLDEN ROD" (Powers), October 16.—A fiftieth wedding anniversary serves as the beginning of this series of pictures from the love affairs of the old couple. The scenes, taken together, tell a sweet story in which goldenrods flourish throughout. Those who enjoy a quiet story well and clearly presented will enjoy this film.

"DOES IT PAY?" (Powers), October 16.—On the same reel as the foregoing appears this slight comedy, picturing in a highly amusing manner the troubles of a mild, shy little man who finds a pocketbook and barely escapes with his life in trying to find its owner. His misadventures are laughable from first to last.

"CAPRICES OF FORTUNE" (Eclair), October 17.—This is a strong two-reel production. It deals with a young man's pursuing of the will-o'-the-wisp, fortune, and of his finding it one day while he is asleep. His undercurrent of philosophy throughout is very pleasing, and the love story adroitly woven into the main thread will win much sympathy. The fortune hunter's first hunting ground is Homestead; a smoky, lurid city of steel, catches the fancy in particular. Failing here, he searches successively in the southland, in the far West, in a Mexican cabaret and in the gold country, but fails in all of these to find wealth. How he finally succeeds and is made to distinguish the good in a girl whose love he scorns to begin with make a very praiseworthy drama. It would be unusually commendable as a scenic alone. More than that, it has the strength of a worth-while idea and commands attention for its able presentation.

"WHEN KELLEY WENT TO WAR" (Milano), October 26.—This half-reel farce comedy introduces Kelley, a soldier without a peer, who fights and vanquishes a foreign foe singlehanded and alone. He returns to a prospective father-in-law, who has sent him to war, with one of the enemy in a suit case and many other trophies of war, thereby winning the esteem of father-in-law-to-be and the greater love of the daughter. There is a good laugh in this.

"STAR EYES' STRATEGEM" (Bison), October 15.—No white character appears in this Indian drama, telling of the great love a Cheyenne brave bore for a daughter of the Sioux. The love for torture, the treachery, the savagery and primitive emotions of the original Americans are admirably expressed in a strong, well-molded plot. The capture of Crowface, the Sioux lover of Star Eye, the heroine, is very commendable. A war dance following the capture of the Cheyenne is extraordinarily colorful. One can almost hear the drums. The whole is full of life and vigor and spirited action and is bound to win strong approbation among those fond of Indian lore. The production compares well with the best of one-reel subjects.

"I. O. U. $10" (Nestor), October 14.—Barring the improbable conditions of a girl promising to marry that one of two rivals who has the most money at the end of three months and of a strange will which gives one of its beneficiaries a million dollars "when he is debt free," this comedy is highly commendable and will get a laugh anywhere. Once the main situation is developed, it grows very amusing. The efforts of Jones, who tries to pay Brown a debt of $10 which Brown does not want to see discharged, are extremely laughable at times. The finish must satisfy everybody because while one fellow gets the girl the other gets the million. The action is lively and clear.

"THE GIRL IN THE GINGHAM GOWN" (Champion), October 14.—Very good and altogether sound is this clean-cut drama handling the clash between the loves of a rich man and a simple country fellow for the "girl in the gingham gown." An heiress jealous of the country sweetheart causes the rivals to come to blows and almost murder. The quarrel is presented convincingly and its finish is full of snappy, unexpected surprise. Interest is steadily maintained throughout by good acting and a plot which is never thin and doubtful. No one could miss the story and all will follow it with interest to the end. As a whole, the film will meet with universal approval.

"THE WHITE BONNET" (Eclair), October 13.—The idea back of this drama is very original and of a strong European flavor. The shrewd father of the heroine asks the two rivals for her hand to send for their mothers. One of the young men proves ashamed of his mother and he is told that he is not a fit son-in-law. This is a simple story, but it is admirably presented. The acting is splendid, there is never any doubt about the meaning and the characters are all clear-cut.

"WHEN TWENTY IS IN LOVE" (Rex), October 13.—This comedy portrays the amusing adventures of a very young man who makes an outcast of himself for the love of a very young girl who takes life very seriously. The fun is wholesome and will have a wide appeal.

"HER DRESSMAKERS' BILLS" (Crystal), October 13.—Pearl White as the extravagant wife and Chester Barnett as the husband who pays the bills play the principal roles in this light comedy. The latter decides to cure his wife of her extravagance and disguises himself as a detective to arrest her for not paying her bills. The resulting situations furnish considerable amusement.

"McGUIRK, SLEUTH" (Crystal), October 13.—On the same film as the above is depicted this brief, disastrous career of McGuirk, an amateur sleuth, who has nothing but a badge to justify him in being in the profession. He comes to grief by interfering with an elopement and throws his badge away in the end. The humor is broad and will miss fire nowhere.

"WHAT THE BELL TOLD" (Gem), October 15.—Interest in this creditable drama centers about a child who ventures to scrape rust from a church bell at midnight because an old negro mammy tells him that such a proceeding will cure his mother who is dangerously ill with a fever. The town is roused by the clanging of the bell and the general gathering of people at the church has been handled as a comic relief. The film will have a wide appeal.

"ON ACCOUNT OF A HANDKERCHIEF" (Reliance), October 16.—A handkerchief blowing from one apartment into another causes the misunderstandings and troubles which characterize this comedy. It makes its point interestingly and vigorously.

"THE BUG AND THE COUNT" (Reliance), October 16.—Following the foregoing on the same film appears this comedy in which an escaped lunatic confiscates the clothing and identity of the Count Derinsky. The scenes are speedy and furnish good food for laughter.

"HIS NURSE" (Lux), October 18.—The foreign flavor of this well presented drama is very pleasing. A sick old man, a prodigal nephew and a pretty but very poor nurse are the principal characters. They are clearly delineated and the situations are all very natural. The film will meet with general approval.

"THE BLIND MAN'S DOG" (Milano), Oct. 19.—Typically Continental is this drama, in which is featured a very intelligent animal. A blind man earns his living by his violin. He is aided by his sister. The sister is abducted by an Apache and concealed in a shed. The animal climbs a ladder and locates the missing woman. He conveys a note describing the location. With the aid of a friend the brother rescues the sister. It may seem to some that if the dog could reach the sister, the sister should have been able to reach the ground and to escape. Nevertheless, the reel will hold.

"THE POSTMAN" (Imp), Oct. 19.—Fred Mace appears in this skit, and contributes to a bit of fun.

"THE EVENTFUL BARGAIN DAY" (Imp), Oct. 19.—On the same reel as the foregoing is an amusing comedy in which Violet Horner, as the woman who would a bargain-hunting go, takes the part of the distressed mother in search of a babe which had been taken from its carriage by a sympathetic old man. A poodle-loving woman, also bargain hunting, had deposited doggie in the carriage. Mother discovered the substitution when she got home. There'll be no complaint about this film.

"HER FRIEND, THE DOCTOR" (Nestor), Oct. 18.—This will make a fair release.

"THE WEDDING MARCH" (Rex), Oct. 17.—A variant of the stolen score story. In this drama by a strange combination of circumstances the thief leads to the altar the daughter of the man who wrote the successful music; the composer is asked to preside at the organ for the ceremony and is given to play his own music. He recognizes the composition in spite of his recent loss of memory, and precipitates a scene, during which the old musician takes his laughter out of the church—unmarried. It will hold.

"THE FUGITIVES" (Imp), Oct. 17.—This is a well-made picture. Herbert Brenon produced it. There are several scenes in which the stone walls of Sing Sing appear. William E. Shay has the role of the Governor and Vivien Prescott is the Governor's wife.

"KING, THE DETECTIVE, AND THE OPIUM SMUGGLERS" (Imp), Oct. 24.—King Baggot has in this melodrama the leading role. Jane Fearnley has the part of the girl. Fred Kelsey is the bully. All are good. There is action aplenty and the interest is sharp.

"THE SHERIFF'S ADOPTED CHILD" (Broncho), Oct. 16.—Fair Western. There is in this picture another case of using a girl to portray the part of a boy, though it is difficult to understand why this is done. It is transparent; therefore it is unconvincing. There are some large scenes and views of fine country.

"THE GOLD BRICK" (Solax), Oct. 16.—A comedy based on the combined stupidity and avariciousness of mankind. Lee Beggs makes fun as the farmer who by a combination of circumstances is permitted to buy a genuine gold brick.

"THE ORGAN GRINDER'S WARD" (Reliance), Oct. 19.—A melodramatic story of a girl who befriended an organ grinder and who repaid the debt by furnishing her a musical education.

"THE BEST MAN WINS" (American), Oct. 21.—This picture is notable for the excellent photography of some charming country views. There is a new stunt in rough-and-tumble fighting. The hero draws the other man's pistol and shoots the man coming to his opponent's aid. The picture will hold.

FORSYTHE OPENS FEATURE EXCHANGE.

J. J. Forsythe, of Shamokin, Pa., has gone to Pittsburgh, where he will open an exchange for the Feature Film Co., of New York City. This firm is the largest importer of strictly feature films in the United States. Mr. Forsythe while manager of the Empire purchased all of his feature films of the above firm and owing to his splendid business ability and reputation for honest dealings he was selected from quite a number of applicants as special manager for the Pittsburgh branch; in fact, the office is being opened with $50,000 worth of films for Mr. Forsythe, who has had vast experience in the feature film business, formerly owner of the state rights for the "Frontier Celebration" pictures of Roosevelt at Cheyenne, Wyoming, which picture was very popular.

PICTURE TO EMPHASIZE VALUE OF BIRTH CERTIFICATES.

The Essanay Company has just completed a full-length photoplay that should arouse the tardy interest of negligent parents in registering carefully the birth certificates of their children. This film is booked for release in the immediate future. The photoplay was produced at the suggestion of Dr. George B. Young, the well known Chicago health commissioner, and is the starting of a campaign of education involving the important use of the motion picture. Dr. C. St. Clair Drake, of the Chicago health board, arranged the scenario, and the film will be put out as a regular release by the Essanay Company. It will also be shown in connection with the traveling exhibit of the Woman's City Club. The story of the photoplay illustrates in a most startling way the lax methods of physicians and parents in not registering the birth certificates of their children and, in direct contrast, portrays the immediate registering of dogs and the rushing business done at this office. The result of parents' negligence is vividly depicted when the boy, whose birth certificate has carelessly been unrecorded, is refused permission to attend school, fails to find office employment, cannot obtain a marriage license and seeks in vain to establish his right to an inheritance, all because of the lack of a birth certificate. The film will undoubtedly go a long way toward arousing public interest in such vital matters.

"ALKALI IKE" IN DEMAND.

Augustus Carney, Essanay's world famous "Alkali Ike," is having the reception of his life in Chicago at present. Ever since Carney appeared in person at the Orpheum Theater two weeks ago and addressed the enormous crowds, Chicago photoplay theater managers are clamoring for his services. Carney addressed the audiences of the Lyda Theater, 38th Ave., and Lake St., during the past week, and met personally every man, woman and child in the neighborhood. The Lyda was packed to the doors throughout the evening shows and the appearance of "Alkali," in his Western garb, was the signal for wild demonstrations on the part of his admirers. George H. Hines, manager of the Lyda, was only too proud to escort "Alkali" to his home for dinner, and the sirloin steak that "Alkali" demolished was not at all in keeping with his diminutive stature. "Alkali Ike's Pants" was the film shown that caused the greatest laughing demonstration ever seen in the theater. Mr. Hines declared he never saw a film "go so big," and is preparing to hold a carnival of "Alkali" pictures for the perpetuation of hilarity among his patrons. Meanwhile, "Alkali" is being featured in some comic masterpieces at the Essanay Chicago studio that are booked for November release.

THE ARMY AND NAVY STRONG FOR POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH.

Instruction given by the aid of the eye has been fully recognized by the leading educators and the world's greatest scientists. A great and very important field, to which the motion pictures could be applied with beneficial results, is the instruction of the recruits of the National Guard with the aid of the cameragraph.

Films could be produced of a company of "regulars" going through the various facings, foot movements, company movements and the manual of arms, which would show clearly and distinctly the correct positions, attitudes and foot movements in the most minute details. Instruction in this manner would prove a great aid to the drill sergeant in the practical training of the soldier recruit.

The success of such instruction would depend a great deal on the film and the machine which projects it. We recommend the installation of a Power's cameragraph at all armories for instructional purposes. These machines are now in use and have given splendid results at the U. S. Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md.; the U. S. Military Academy, West Point, N. Y.; Fort Sill, Oklahoma; Fort Scriven, Georgia; Fort Monroe, Virginia; Fort Ethan Allen, Vermont; Fort Totten, N. Y.; League Island Navy Yard, Philadelphia, Pa.; the Navy Y. M. C. A., Brooklyn, N. Y.; the Army Y. M. C. A., Boston, Mass.; and also have been installed aboard the U. S. S. Florida, Utah and Panther.—The National Military and Naval Review.

POWER BACK FROM EUROPE.

Nicholas Power, whose name is known to practically every moving picture man in the country, has just returned from an extended tour of Europe. Mr. Power was away about six months. He returns looking hale and hearty and has already buckled down to hard work at the factory. We may look for something new in the way of Power's projecting machinery before long, now that the presiding genius is again at the helm.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON

From Los Angeles.

LOS ANGELES, Cal., Mr. J. G. MacLean, operator of the Teatro Hidalgo, which is, according to the letter head, the only theater in California showing Spanish vaudeville direct from Spain and Mexico City, contributes the following:

> A few words from the "city of Angels" to inform you that the exhibiting business is good here. Mr. Bierhaus (manager and owner, I take it.—Ed.) and myself are constant readers of The World and we both derive much benefit therefrom. This house was opened on September 14th, and we are playing to S. R. O. most of the time. Mr. Bierhaus imported a stock company, composed of ten people, direct from old Mexico and we are catering exclusively to the Mexican population of the city. We show four reels of fourteen-day independent pictures. I have as good an operating room (not a "dog-house," "coop" or "box") as there is in the city. We have the first and only Simplex projector in town and my projection is considered the acme of that article. I also have a spot and dissolver, which makes a very complete equipment. The operating room is 20 feet long, 9 feet wide, and 8 feet from floor to ceiling. It has two large outside vents. I am a member of the I. A. T. S. E., Local 150, and can report very favorably upon conditions generally, with the exception of the license proposition, which we are trying to remedy, and are leaving no stone unturned in the endeavor to bring about a change.

It is not a pleasant thing to have to publish such a report concerning the city of Los Angeles as the one printed recently. I would suggest to Brother MacLean, and to Local 150, that it probably would not do any harm to send a committee up to the Mayor and show him what we have said about the Los Angeles examination, and call his attention to the fact that that report has gone all over the civilized world, asking him if it is not about time such a disgraceful thing was remedied.

Power's "Five" Outside Shutter.

Wilkie, Sask., Canada, writes:

> In looking over back numbers of The World, I ran across a letter headed "Flicker." In this communication it was stated that Power's Five should be made flickerless by the use of a three-wing outside shutter. I would appreciate information as to where an outside three-wing shutter attachment could be had for Power's Five.

So far as I know, Wilkie, it cannot be "had." You have to make it yourself. If you go back far enough in your back numbers, you will find two or three photographs of Power's Fives, for which the operators have themselves made three-wing outside shutter attachment. It works very good. You might, however, first try Mr. Lavezzi's three-wing inside shutter. I cannot say whether it is valuable or not, as I have never seen or tried one, but you might purchase one, provided Mr. Lavezzi will give you a proper guarantee. Let him do one of two things, viz.: either send a shutter to the department to be tested and reported on through these columns, or else let him send you one on agreement to return the money within twenty-four hours of your receiving the shutter if it is not satisfactory. Twenty-four hours will give you ample time to test the shutter and decide whether it is all right or not.

Simple Questions.

Washington, propounds the following questions:

> Why is it that, on a. c., when you run too fast or too slow the picture flickers; more especially when you run too fast? We are using a two wing shutter, two 6½ condensers, 12 foot picture. Use 50 amperes and are not able to get a white light. It seems to be blurry and yet not out-of-focus. Am using a rheostat. What is the difference between 30 and 60 cycle 110 volt current, and what difference does it make in the light? What is the difference between a multiple and series rheostat; which is best and why? I hope to have an early reply, and to meet you at the 1913 convention, to be held in Seattle.

Some of your questions are very elementary, though the first two are somewhat puzzling. You will of course, get a flicker when you run too slow. The reason therefor has been explained and re-explained many times in this department and in the hand-book. But why you should get a flicker when you run too fast, using a two wing shutter, I am unable to understand, unless it is that you are using 30 cycle current and the two wing shutter gets in synchronism with one side of the alternations. This would produce a flashing of the light, the same as we have when using a three wing shutter on 60 cycle current and overspeeding the machine. If you are using 50 amperes of 110 volt current, you are wasting more than 3,700 watts, and I would suggest that you get a transformer, mercury arc rectifier, or motor-generator set right away. I don't know exactly what the result would be using 30 cycle current through a rheostat (neither do I know you are using 30 cycle or only guessing at it), therefore will not try to answer your question about light until I have more definite information. The difference between 30 and 60 cycle current is that with 30 cycle there are 60 alternations per second and with 60 cycle there are 120 alternations per second. The 60 cycle would produce a more steady light than the 30 cycle, since with 30 cycle current the alternations are so far apart that there is likely to be a perceptible flickering of the illumination. Multiple and series you will find set forth fully in either the old hand-book or the new one. If you have not a copy of the old book, you should have, and I would advise by all means that you send in $2.50 for the new hand-book—a book of about 400 pages, in which all these things will be thoroughly and completely explained. We hope to have it ready for delivery about November the first.

Address Wanted.

Mr. L. H. Chapman, Prop., New Gem Theater, 211 Bieecker St., Utica, N. Y., writes:

> In reading a recent issue of the Projection Department, I notice an item from our friend in Kalamazoo, Mich., in which he says he used a preparation which is furnished by the International Exhibitors on his plastered-wall screen. Now, as the writer wants to keep up-to-date and is always on the lookout for any improvement which will better the service in his house and give greater satisfaction to his patrons, he takes the liberty of asking you to furnish the address of the International Exhibitors, as referred to in the Kalamazoo letter.

I am as much in the dark as you are, friend Chapman, and have given your address so that Kalamazoo can supply you with the necessary data by mail, thus avoiding any delay. I would however, request that he also supply the department with the address and further information about the coating, if he will be so kind.

Great Heavens!

Erie, Pa., propounds the following:

> (1) What is that shutter between the lamphouse, lens and slide opening for? (2) What is the correct way to set the fan on Power's 6A machine? (3) Why does a rheostat have to be connected with a picture machine? (4) Does it make any difference what way a film is patched? (5) How should my rheostat be connected to get the best light? (6) Let me know where I can get an operator's license, as we have no license here in Erie. I have trouble with setting my carbon and get a blue spot in the center of the picture. What can I do to overcome this?

Man, I don't think you need to hunt up any licensing authority, because you could not come within a hundred miles of getting a license. My advice to you is to proceed to serve an apprenticeship under some competent operator. I believe I cannot be accused by anyone of refusing to answer elementary questions, but there is a limit to everything and it is plain to be seen, Erie, that you have absolutely no knowledge whatever of operating, therefore I could not consistently kill the space necessary to answer your questions. This department is designed and intended to aid and assist operators—not to make operators. I fully understand and realize that the small town man is likely to propound some very simple questions, and I am willing to answer them too, but where he displays an absolutely total lack of knowledge—that is something else again, since he cannot possibly put on a creditable show, and I would merely be assisting in imposing inferior projection on audiences that pay their money to see a show. Go somewhere and serve an apprenticeship, Erie. That is all the advice I can give.

Impossible.

New York City, writes:

> Will you kindly supply some information in regard to the relative merits of Arco B, and Bio carbons. This will settle a dispute between a carbon dealer and myself. The dealer contends that the quality is the same, only they have two brands. I have used both and think one is better than the other.

It is out of the question, New York, to supply such information as that through the department. Also there is no necessity for it. If you think the Bio are the best, buy them. If you think the Arco B are the best, buy them. Whichever one you may wish to purchase is your business, and not the business of the dealer. As for me, I would purchase whichever one gave me the best results, and the dealer could talk himself black in the face before I would change that determination.

In Error.

Princeton, Ill., propounds the following:

> Believe I have something of interest to my fellow exhibitors. You will note by the attached light bills that the rate for one week was 8 k. w. at six cents, or a total of forty-eight cents, for the week; whereas, the succeeding week, the bill was thirty-six cents, this being the bill for the Eagle Theater, where I used a compensarc on the 60 ampere notch, running six nights from 7 P. M. until 10:30 P. M. This is of course, for the machine only, it being on a separate circuit. However, do you not consider it as being very, very low? I use a.c., 110 volt, 60 cycle, but the current saving device (compensarc) alone would account for it, as I use the same kind of outfit at the Stevens Theater, using the compensarc on the 40 ampere notch, and the attached bill shows $9.34 for one month.

In the Stevens, we used No. 6 wire for the machine, of which there is but one. In the Eagle, however, I used a No. 4 wire from the meter to the compensarc and No. 6 from there to the machines, of which there are two. My theory is that exhibitors can save money by using large wire; also by having two machines, used alternately. The wires from compensarc to lamp do not get so hot. We use the compensarc on the 60 ampere notch all the time at the Eagle.

Princeton is in error in attributing the low rate to the large wires. There is no appreciable loss in the wire itself so long as there is no considerable rise in its temperature; but if the wire gets hot, then there is considerable loss as well as injury to the illumination. However, No. 6 wire in good condition would be far more than ample to carry the primary current to a 60 ampere arc attached to a transformer secondary. As a matter of fact, Princeton has got things exactly backwards. If No. 4 wire is to be used, then it should have been used between the compensarc and the lamps, instead of between the switch and the compensarc, where the amperage is much lower. Sixty amperes at the arc would mean only about 25 amperes between the switch and the compensarc, and a No. 6 wire is rated at 46 amperes. Of course, if your switch were located a long distance from the compensarc, that would be something else again, but it would have to be a good way off to cause any heating. If your No. 6 wire at the Stevens gets hot there is something wrong with it, and you had better rip it out and put in a new wire. The charge of thirty-six cents is ridiculous for the amount of current used. The only explanation I see is that there is something wrong with the meter.

Not Correct.

Helena, Ark., writes:

I would like to have you advise me as to what time you expect to have your new Operators' Hand-Book on the market for sale, as I wish to obtain one as soon as possible. I would also like to have you give me the address of some firms in your city that are in a position to furnish countershafts and various motor connections to put on the different machines and supply three wheel grooved pulleys of various diameters of say 8, 12 and 16 inches to fit shafts of about 5/8 inch. Do you think it a good idea to install a shaft about 10 inches long with the cog, sprocket and grooved pulley in the same position as the upper sprocket wheel now is, to permit the use of a drive from this point, i. e., to take out the shaft which the cog wheel and sprocket are attached to, and put in a longer shaft with the addition of a grooved pulley about 3 inch diameter? In conection with the Edison Model "B."

In a recent argument with a supposed to be Operator, he claimed that the longer the throw of the motion picture lens, the less the picture was apt to jump, but I looked at the matter entirely different, that is to say—that the shorter the throw the less apt it was to jump, for the simple reason that on the long throws the least lost motion in the intermittent, which results in a jumping of the film, will multiply in proportion to the length of the throw, whereas, with the short throw, the same defect in the intermittent will not multiply so rapidly owing to the shorter radius. Why was the Pathe machine taken from the American market? When can I obtain a list of all the M. P. shows in Arkansas?

As before stated, we expect to have the hand-book ready for delivery by November the first. We do not guarantee this, but expect to accomplish it. As to the address, I would suggest that you secure one in St. Louis, or Chicago. Write the Enterprise Optical Co., 564 West Randolph St., Chicago, Ill., mentioning my name, and I belive they will supply you with the name of a Chicago firm who can furnish the articles you need. I see no reason why the Edison Model B should not be driven in the way you suggest. You are in error about the magnification of movement with an increased length of throw. Your sketch shows plainly where you fell down in your calculations. Of course, if you increase the throw and the size of the picture, or if you increase the size of the picture without increasing the throw, then you would increase what movement there might be, in proportion. Added length of throw increases any movement which is due to vibration of the machine itself, but vibration of the film in the machine—that is to say, jumping or side movement, is only increased when size of the picture is made greater.

I cannot tell you why the Pathe machine was taken off the market: Most likely it was because the sales were not large enough to justify the selling expense. I presume any one of the Little Rock film exchanges can supply a list of Arkansas picture theaters.

Camera Movement.

Louisville, Ky., propounds the following:

I would like very much to have information as follows: What movements are generally used in moving picture cameras? If the Star Wheel movement is not used, why not?

The movement most commonly used in M. P. cameras is what is known as the claw movement, colloquially termed by operators the "finger feed." The star and geneva is not usually used. Cameramen claim that the claw movement is more decisive; meaning that the film travels downward with a more snappy jerk than can be had with a star and geneva movement, which is more or less rotary in action.

Condenser Mount Suggestion.

Minnesota, sends the following valuable contribution:

For the benefit of those who still use the old style lamphouse with round condenser casing, and are troubled with condenser breakage, let me suggest a remedy as shown by accompanying sketch. The mount is to be set so it will not extend into the lamphouse nor even touch it. This can be accomplished by using washers as shown. I was troubled with chronic condenser breakage, even though back of lamphouse was entirely removed. Condensers fitted very loosely, and I was not pulling more than 25 amperes d.c. Set my condensers as per sketch, about a year ago, and since then have not broken one lens. You will note that air space in sketch 1 appears to be more than 1/16 of an inch and in sketch 2, mount extends far into lamphouse. Drawings are exaggerated to give a clearer idea. Was prompted to send this in upon reading an article in last week's issue, and another illustrated some time ago where practically the same results were accomplished by punching holes around the mount in lamphouse. But why punch holes when there is a simpler method?

The proposed change is a radical one indeed, and I am not at all prepared to say what the result might be; still after all, I am not at all sure that the introduction of an open air draught would not work all right. I would suggest to machine manufacturers that they experiment with this idea and see if it is not of value. The opening would, of course, have to be covered with wire gauze in order to satisfy the authorities. I am inclined to advise operators to test this scheme out, where they can do it without injuring their lamphouses. I had an idea of my own several years ago as follows: Set the condenser half an inch ahead of its normal position and make the lamphouse with two front walls, with an air space, open top and bottom, between; the hole in the back wall to be closed with sheet of annealed glass. The trouble was, however, that I could not get annealed glass which could be depended upon. One piece would be all right and the next would break very quickly. Your sketch has been reduced, so the exaggeration is not so very noticeable. The 1/16 inch space is marked plainly enough to give the idea.

Calcium Light.

Urbana, Va., writes:

We are traveling exhibitors using calcium light, and while we are constant readers of the Projection Department, we have seen very little concerning this illuminant. We use an Enterprise Model B gas making outfit, but have a good deal of trouble with it as the flow of gas is uneven; also there is boiling over. Could you tell us the cause and how to remedy it? We also have an Edison gas making outfit which gives an even flow of gas, but which consumes sixteen cakes of ozone in half an hour—about three times more than the Enterprise. This of course, is prohibitive. Should the Edison use that much? If not, what is the cause of the excessive consumption? We get a good sharp picture at 20 feet; lamphouse back 14 inches; small spot, and lens in close, but when we have over 20 feet throw, our picture is not sharp or clear. We have tried moving our lens and lamphouse nearer without results. 20 feet gives a 6 x 7 picture.

We are having articles on gas making outfits prepared, or at least we have requested that they be prepared both by the Enterprise Optical Company and the Edison Company. They will doubtless appear shortly. The reason you have not seen much about gas is that there is not much gas used nowadays. We shall be glad indeed to have articles from gas users giving complete instruction in the use of gas and of its making; in fact all the points that might be of value to gas users. As to your Enterprise Model B, there is something wrong with it. The combination of uneven flow of gas and boiling over would indicate an uneven pressure in the gas chamber, but I am not familiar enough with this device to say what would be the probable cause of such a condition. As to the Edison, I think there is no doubt but that there is a bad leakage of gas somewhere. That is what the condition you describe would indicate. It is also possible that you are using a very large tip on your burner. If so would suggest that you get a smaller one. As to the out-of-focus effect when you throw more than 20 feet; when distance from lens to screen is altered, distance of lens from film must also be altered by means of adjustment screws. Very likely your lens has not enough adjustment to take care of the added throw.

Alternating Current Pressure.

Denver, Colo., writes:

The statement was made to me recently that the current we commonly term 110 volt or 220 volt a.c., is not that at all. In other words, the pressure of a.c., as indicated by the voltmeter is not the real pressure: Now is this correct? If it is not correct please explain the matter.

The voltmeter pressure, Denver, is the correct pressure—that is to say, it is the correct effective pressure, but it is not the extreme pressure. Alternating current starts at zero voltage at the beginning of each alternation, and mounts upward until the peak of pressure is reached. We thus have two extremes. During the first part of the alternation the pressure is low, and during the last part it is very high, the mean effective pressure being about 70% of the extreme. The peak pressure of 220 volt alternating current is really over 300 volts, and the 220 represents the effective pressure. This is, however, a question of no particular interest to the operator.

If you take the peak pressure (I have manufactured the term "peak pressure" myself to suit my own convenience) of a.c., it would only have about 70% of effectiveness as compared to a similar pressure of d.c.

Light Trouble.

South Berwick, Me., writes as follows:

Trust I will be welcomed to the department. I would like to ask a few questions, and know of no better place to go for information. Am using Power's 6A and the manager says my light is O. K., but it doesn't suit me. Am projecting a 14½ foot picture at 47½ feet, using from 25 to 60 amperes of 110 volt current; two 6½ condensers. My light is unsteady and am compelled to keep changing from 25 to 35 and 45 and sometimes even to 60 amperes. This is not due to loose connections, as I have examined everything carefully. Do you suppose it could be in the transformer? I worked in the same place last year with Power's 5 and it was the same story. The arc sometimes makes more noise than a saw-mill, and the next instant I can hardly hear it, and bang! the light goes yellow. Have already broken two condensers. If I use one 7½ and one 6½ could I pull the arc back farther from the lenses, and thus avoid breaking them? Am using a transarc. I used the same Power's Five last winter at the beach, and the current was steady as a rock. We are running five reels of licensed pictures, with the opposition running the same.

The conditions, as you describe them, seem to indicate fluctuating pressure. I would suggest that you have the light company test the voltage of your feed wires on the primary side of the transarc. Get them to put in a voltmeter and leave it there for one day. Just what the cause of the fluctuation is I could not say, but from your description, that is undoubtedly what happens. It is possible that your street mains are feeding some big hall, or a theater in which large numbers of lights are switched on and off occasionally, and that the street mains are overloaded when all these lights are on. I don't know that this is the fact, but it is the most likely explanation of your trouble. If you find this is not the case, then there must be something wrong with that transarc. The projection machine itself has nothing to do with the matter. Yes, one 6½ and one 7½ lens would bring your arc farther back, but it might cause a ghost. You can try it and see. As to your being "welcome to the department," my dear sir, the department is open to any and every operator and manager in the United States, Canada or any other country. The only requirement is that they be in need of information or have something interesting and of value to contribute.

Various Things.

Conneaut, Ohio, contributes the following interesting letter:

It has been some time since you heard from this town but I assure you we are still on the map. We now have four moving picture shows and one vaudeville house. There are seven of Power's "Six" machines and one Edison in operation in the city; six of the former being run by motor, belted to the fly-wheel (which is mechanically bad). Of these, four are under my own care. Two have been run for a year and nine months, and we have yet to pay out one cent for repairs. Aperture plate shows some wear; so do the sprockets. I know of four other Power's "Sixes" and one Power's "Five" run by motor belted to the fly-wheel. The five was run four years by hand and the last two years by motor, and has never been back to the factory. James Chambless, Evansville, Ind., makes a motor drive attachment which looks good to me. I enclose two photos of my switchboard on the back wall of the operating room. You will notice I have my a. c. service switch and meter and d. c. meter pilot lights; field regular ground detectors; five double branch cut-outs (only three showing); house light dimmer; double pole, double throw switch, and three point sliding switch for rheostat, all where I can reach them. I expect this kind of an arrangement would not pass in some places, but I built the whole thing myself and would not have it any other way. Some men kick about the field regulator being in the operating room, but after working in one house for two years with the field rheostat down cellar and no way to get at it, should the voltage raise or drop, without stopping the show, I most emphatically do not agree with the regulator being located anywhere else than within reach of the operator. One man says the operator has all he can do if he watches the picture, which is all very true with some men, but I know of one who would not sit looking at the picture and let his light go out. On the switchboard will be seen house light dimmer, marked 1, which is used to dim, eight 40 watt tungstens in green glass shades. Three houses use this system. Now just a word about those ground detectors concerning which you asked information: They do burn in series but a ground on the positive wire, negative lamp, burns brightly. The sliding switch, marked 2, is used in connection with Power's rheostat and a Sterling coil. With lever as shown, it is for a. c. through the Sterling. If moved to the next point we have eight coils, and on the next point five coils of the rheostat. And now a word or two about our power plant: We have a 7½ k. w. dynamo, twelve h.p. engine, and use 50 amperes of 110 volt current. We don't use a.c. when the plant is running. We use 110 volts because we have to use a.c. sometimes in the forenoon, as we only run five hours a day. Now do not think because I have not asked you a lot of questions that I don't have any trouble, for I do. But with good oil and horse sense I get along in fine shape. We just could not manage without the Moving Picture World, and hope that, for ever and ever, you will keep the good work up. I am waiting for that new hand-book to come off the press. Please excuse mistakes as I am a better mechanic than writer.

The record of Power's "Sixes," in Conneaut, shows that they have had the right kind of usage and have been properly lubricated. If those machines had been grinding film through at the rate of ten minutes to a thousand feet, and had been lubricated with a mixture of one drop of oil and seven drops of advertising, there would have been a different story to tell. I would suggest that this man Chambless either send one of his motor drives or else an adequate description of it, so that we can set forth its points in the department. Your switchboard is excellent, the only objection there could be is that in some cities it is required that all switches and fuses be enclosed in metal cabinets, but with a rightly constructed board, such as yours seems to be, there is no especial reason for this, other than the vagaries of the authorities. I thoroughly agree with you that the field regulator should be within reach of the operator when he is seated in operating position. I am decidedly of the opinion that the operator should have his eye on the picture all the time, and I claim it to be a fact that unless he does watch the picture every second it is on the screen, he cannot properly project it. This does not mean, however, that he watches the picture in the same way that the audience watches it. I have run a picture half a dozen times, watched it every instant it was on the screen, and could not then have told you what the picture was about, except in a very, very general way. I was watching for faults in the light and to gauge proper speed of projection—not to follow the story of the film. The operator who watches the picture will learn to read his lamp adjustments through the fault appearing on the screen, and will know exactly what should be done to remedy it; and the doing of the thing becomes an automatic action, so far as his hands are concerned. I maintain that this is the only proper method for the operator to pursue if he wants to produce really high class projection. Your explanation about the ground detector doesn't explain. What I want to know is this: If two lamps are connected in series between the two positive and negative wires, what in Sam Hill prevents those lamps from burning at about a half c.p. all the time, regardless of whether there is a ground or there is not a ground? There is some point there that I haven't caught, and it is that particular point I am after. Kindly come forward with the explanation.

Altering Lens.

Nevada, writes:

Have been informed that an ordinary projection lens may be made to vary the size of the picture somewhat by varying the distance between the separate elements which go to make up the lens. Is this true? If so, how is it done? What condenser combination do you regard as best when using a 5 or 5½ inch e. f. projection lens on a 68 foot throw? What can you say as to the adaptability of the so called adjustable lens for projection? Am not supplied with a hand-book, but want to get one when the new issue comes out.

It is quite true that the varying of the distance between the two factors of a projection lens will vary the size of the picture, but it is also likely to injure the definition, and I would not advise anyone to attempt any such stunt as this. The distance between the two factors may be shortened by cutting off a portion of the lens barrel and re-threading. It may be lengthened by adding an extension ring, which any competent machinist can make. Two 7½ condensing lenses should be O. K. I have seen adjustable lenses which gave excellent results, but it has not yet been proven to me that these lenses may be uniformly relied upon for the best work. We are bending every effort to get the new hand-book out by November the first, and expect to fill the orders already in the office on that date.

Advice Wanted.

Ottawa, Canada, writes:

I would like to ask a few questions concerning an invention I have been working on for a long time, and which I believe I can get to work satisfactorily. It is an automatic fire shutter which is supposed to close down when the film stops passing through the gate, or if the film breaks the shutter will drop and shut off the light. I have not seen any machine equipped with this kind of a shutter, and would like to know if it is worth while patenting such a device. Would you kindly advise me before I go any further in this matter?

I am afraid it would not be wise to patent such a shutter. I could not speak with authority without first having examined the device, but I very much doubt your reaping any financial reward. In the first place, there have been a number of such shutters invented and some of them worked quite well too, but they didn't seem to meet with favor. There is no man on earth who could say positively that it would not pay you to patent such a shutter, but my own opinion, based on such knowledge of the matter as I possess, leads me to believe it would not. I am sorry to have to tell you this, but it is better to drop the matter now than lose money.

"At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs."

By G. F. Blaisdell.

THE Lubin debut of Edwin August will afford gratification to his friends, as it will give pleasure to many who have not before seen his work on the screen. In "His Life," Mr. August has a good opportunity to show what he can do in drama of to-day. For one scene, that of the masked ball, we see him in Roman costume—a garb between which and Mr. August there is much in common. Lubin's new leading man takes to costume work like a veteran of the old-time stage. As a matter of fact, he has had training in this department of acting under stage veterans of standing. Those who were privileged to see Mr. August in "The Blot in the Scutcheon" know what he can do in costume before the camera. It is to be hoped he will give us more of this kind of drama. Unquestionably there is a market for it; and there seems to be no attempt to produce costume plays on the part of American manufacturers, the field practically being left clear for the foreign makers.

In "His Life" we see not only good drama, carefully portrayed and painstakingly staged. We see most effectively brought into play the refinements of the screen—the use of an initial curtain, which, being parted, reveals the title of the play and an announcement of the stars; these, in turn, fade into an animated photograph, introducing Miss Hawley and Mr. August, which is all very prettily done, the two shaking hands and bowing and smiling; the photograph dissolves into the opening scene of the play—Mr. August caressing the hand of his crippled mother and kissing her good-by as he starts for the city to begin the battle of life. Throughout the play much use is made of the dissolving picture—the scene changing from the city to the country. On the one hand there is the successful man, surrounded by metropolitan allurements, his mother and sweetheart forgotten; on the other, the sweetheart paying devoted attention to the helpless mother, now wheeling her out into the sunlight, again changing her over in front of the fireplace, and in the glow of the coals sitting at her knee and reading to her.

As Edwin starts for the city he asks Ormi, his sweetheart, to care for his mother. He leaves home in a soft hat and soft shirt. We do not see him for a year. Ormi has written him a pathetic note telling him he is breaking his mother's heart and that if he has any love for her he must come home at once. The letter is torn up. Just at the time he is under the spell of another, with whom he frequents the gilded restaurants. At the masked ball Edwin, in Roman costume, dances with the ultra-decollete charmer. A scrubwoman, discharged by a drunken janitor, in desperation goes to the dance when she learns her employer is there and asks for reinstatement. Reluctantly Edwin leaves the dance. He listens to the woman, sends to the wardrobe for money and then gives it to her. As she reaches for the notes Edwin gets a glance at the calloused and twisted old fingers. He looks down at his strange garb. The curtain shows the scene that comes to his mind—that of the good-by to his mother and his sweetheart. Under sudden impulse he returns to the dance. He tears through the throng of revelers, creating consternation and commotion. He gets into his street clothes and boards an automobile. He sits alongside the chauffeur. The machine travels fast. Edwin takes off his hat. Now we are at the side of his car, again in front. Finally the machine stops at the old gate and Edwin goes into the house. He enters softly. His mother's back is to the door. She cannot see her son, neither can she hear him. She feels his presence. Wonderingly she turns her head; eyes meet. The son is in his mother's arms. Edwin reaches out an arm to Ormi. The scene fades and we see in bold letters "His Life's Story Told." The curtain falls. It is real drama—artistic, finished.

King Baggot is scheduled for three releases shortly—"King the Detective and the Opium smugglers," "John Smith, Alderman," and "The Necklace." Mr. Baggot recently received a newspaper clipping from the Philadelphia Press, in which a writer on that paper spoke of him in glowing terms referring to the fine work Mr. Baggot is doing. Mr. Baggot was also interviewed by the Buffalo Courier a week ago, and by two other periodicals not strictly devoted to the moving picture art.

We are promised a real ship situation in "The Long Strike," a two-reel production soon to be put out by Herbert Brenon. In order to be assured of just the scene he wanted he was compelled to use many hundreds of feet of film. The result was two reels out of 4000 feet to select from.

The Kinemacolor Company had a camera on board the presidential yacht Mayflower during the naval review in New York harbor. Also the company had three cutters at its disposal for use as might be needed. These privileges were secured directly through the President at Beverly. Wednesday night a Kinemacolor show was given to the officers and men of the Connecticut. It is safe to say that several miles of film were used by the various manufacturers in the taking of fleet pictures.

Herbert Brenon, one of the three directors of Imp Films, slipped over a good one on a recent night when he photographed the railroad wreck on the New Haven Road, beating out every other photographer by several hours. Herbert left the meeting of the Board of Governors of the Screen Club, took one of the Imp automobiles, scurried around town until nearly two o'clock picking up his camera men, his leading man, heavy man, and leading woman, and then started to the scene of the wreck, arriving there just before dawn. He took a long scene in a photoplay which he had been working on and followed this up by securing 200 feet of film showing the wreck before the wrecking crew had removed the damaged cars or the debris from the tracks.

Archibald Flickers MacArthur, sometimes affectionately alluded to as "Watso"—never, however, with his acknowledgment or consent—has departed this shore—temporarily. He is at this moment looking over Chicago; and those who know him best are keenly aware that it is through no eye of ordinary perception that he is gazing on the beauties of the Western metropolis. If you who inhabit other portions of this wide country than is contained in the boundaries of Cook County perceive an unusual smile on the face of Chicago you will understand the reason. For is not Archie there? And New York? Sad indeed are we. The sun has retired behind dreary-looking clouds; the bells in the adjacent Metropolitan tower by their subdued tone plainly indicate the all-pervading gloom; and a myriad of disconsolate damosels bear mute if unwitting testimony to the pall that hovers over G-tham. We await the return, confident it will be that of a conquerer, fearing only that in the triumphal procession our comrade may be relegated to a subordinate position—say, second place. The corps of bachelors in this establishment has suffered three onslaughts during the summer. Now, Mac, please be good!

Manufacturers Advance Notes

A STIRRING KING BAGGOT MELODRAMA.

On October 24 Imp will release another King Baggot which will interest his admirers. It is entitled "King the Detective and the Opium Smugglers." Jane Fearnley has the part of the girl and Fred Kelsey that of the bully. King is sent to uncover a band of smugglers. He goes in the guise of a fisherman. Through stopping a quarrel between a small brother and sister he meets the girl. As the two get better acquainted the detective is invited to the house of the girl. He meets Jane's father—and the bully, in love with Jane. The bully does not like the detective—and takes pains to reveal the fact. The smugglers are shown carrying their stuff ashore in bags and depositing it in a shed.

King attends a dance at which also is the father of Jane. The old man has been imbibing a little too freely and King offers to take him home. The bully starts a fight, however, before the party can get out of the hall. He does not get the best of it. Jane thanks King. The bully waits his chance and when it comes he puts King out by a blow on the head with a club. Then he binds the detective and throws him into the shed where is stored the smuggled stuff. Then the bully goes to get the band to assist him in getting King out of the way. The little brother of Jane has been a witness of the assault, however, and runs to tell Jane. She loses no time in going to King's aid and removing the bonds. King sees the stuff in the shed and sets out in a rowboat for assistance. The bully discovers the escape and starts in pursuit. He overtakes King and, getting into his boat, chops a hole in the bottom of his boat, leaving the exhausted detective to drown.

Jane and her brother, fearing to go home after liberating King, watch the bully. The boy, following him, overhears the story as to what happened to the boat. He tells his sister, and the girl goes down to the waterfront and jumps into a motor boat. King is rescued just in time. The bully and his crowd are shortly afterward arrested. King does not arrest Jane; but he captured her, nevertheless.

THINGS DOING AT THE CARLTON SHOP.

Announcement is made at the Reliance Motion Picture Studio, 540 West Twenty-first Street, that C. Lang Cobb is to have full charge of the advertising and publicity departments of the Reliance and Majestic Motion Picture Companies.

Producer Oscar C. Appel has in preparation for a Majestic release two reels of Steele Mackaye's "Hazel Kirke," a drama well known to theatergoers of a quarter century ago. The film will feature Mabel Trunnelle and Herbert Prior.

Another picture just finished at the laboratory is "Men Who Dare," which deals with the prison labor contract system. The story is by Forrest Halsey, a writer on themes of vital present-day interest. Mr. Halsey is to work exclusively for the Majestic and Reliance companies.

"From Cow to Consumer" is a big subject soon to be announced. The film will interestingly depict just what the title indicates. It is said that, entirely independent of its educational and other features, the production will be notable for its fine photography.

Producer Tony O'Sullivan had some interesting stories to tell of the making of the picture, "The Peddler's Find." Mr. O'Sullivan wanted to change the title to "The Great Heart of a Jew," a name that would better indicate the nature of the film, but the work of the printers had proceeded too far. Many of the scenes in the drama are laid on New York's East Side, with which Mr. O'Sullivan is thoroughly familiar. The camera was carried in a covered wagon, with just a slit for the lens. Gertrude Robinson, taking the part of a blind girl, had one or two experiences. As she was picking her way along under the Williamsburg Bridge, a benevolent elderly woman took her by the arm and said, "Can I help you, child?" As she started across the Bowery at the busy junction of Delancey Street several men jumped from the sidewalk to escort her. "Both retakes," said Mr. O'Sullivan.

"The Peddler's Find" is making a hit on the East Side, and well it may. Scenario writers and manufacturers have overlooked a most interesting field in the East Side. There should be plenty of room for good strong stories of a people comprising a fifth of the population of the metropolis—of a race the history of which is rich in dramatic stories of self-sacrifice, of battles fought against great odds—and won.

NOVEL ITALA POSTERS.

The Itala Film Company of America is introducing a novel and attractive line of pictorial printing with their long films. Posters are lithographed in six colors showing exact scenes from the film. On the larger styles of paper at least three scenes are shown on each poster. Manager Raver, of the Itala Company, personally superintends the designing of his posters and takes particular pains to select such scenes as will attract and draw patronage to the theater.

Agnes Egan Cobb, who is personal representative for Harry R. Raver, manager of the Itala Film Company of America, reports flattering returns from the first announcement of the company's initial release, "Souls in Torture," which appeared in the Moving Picture World. Letters came pouring in from nearly every state in the Union, while Canada was also much in evidence.

ECLAIR DIRECTOR SAILS FOR PARIS.

"JOHN STERLING, ALDERMAN" (Imp).

A very timely two-reel picture, dealing with municipal politics, is to be released by the Imp Company on October 31st. It is called "John Sterling, Alderman," and gives us a truthful and vivid insight into the practices of franchise-grabbing corporations. A very dramatic situation develops when John Sterling, who has worked his way up from the people and from the lowest rungs of the ladder, shows as alderman a disposition to give the people a square deal. For when the franchise grabbers find that he, and he alone, is blocking their scheme, they try to bribe him and, failing in this, rake up his unfortunate youth with a view to scaring him into complacence. In his very early days, he had been a "crook"; but had married and made a man of himself. The struggle is tense; it most decidedly keeps us in suspense; but works out to a very pleasing denouement. This bare outline of the story gives very little of its quality. King Baggot knows how to produce a picture and, when he has so good a scenario as this, he makes a sure success of it. This one is a big success; it is human, wholesome and beautiful; a desirable feature.

Jane Fearnley and King Baggot in a Scene from "John Sterling, Alderman" (Imp).

In the early scenes we find John Sterling at the turning of the ways. He is an Ishmaelite of the slums, but is in love and feels a longing for better things. His awakening comes dramatically while he is robbing a house. The owner of the house helps him and he makes good. We see him now as a storekeeper and we find him a good citizen. He is elected alderman and, as the closing scene of the first reel, we have a very capably made picture of the aldermanic chamber at the moment when the question of the franchise first comes up. Sterling stands one against all; but an unanimous vote is needed and the meeting breaks up with passions still at high tension.

The producer has used for the picture's brighter contrasts the alderman's home life. Miss Jane Fearnley plays Sterling's wife. She and King Baggot, with a girl of about six who plays their child, give a most engaging atmosphere to this part of the picture. All the latter scenes are affected by it; it lifts up and brightens the whole production. The wife has an especially fine moment when her almost distracted husband spreads out before her the whole situation, telling her what his youth had been and what hold upon him the grafting corporations have. It gives her a chance to show her mettle and, as Miss Fearnley pictures her, she rises nobly to the need. She is true blue; she will stand beside him and fight it out, and it is she who persuades him to put the whole business in the hands of the District Attorney, by whom the bribe-givers are finally brought to justice.

If the leading players who acted this picture had done the only good work, it would probably have seemed cheap. Nothing has been slighted and no part is weakly presented. The producer has given the same care to his least scenes as to his climax and has made a worthy picture.

"THE SIMPLE LIFE" (Pathe American).

Miss Gwendoline Pates plays the leading role in an original comedy, entitled "The Simple Life," which is based upon the efforts of the enormously rich to find diversion. The production is up to the usual Pathe Freres standard and with this fact there is no question of its good quality. It will be released October 23d. This is the story:

Miss Gwendoline Nealon, daughter of a well-known millionaire, is besieged by suitors of all descriptions who dog her every movement and are boring her almost to death. A gypsy girl who calls to read Miss Nealon's palm gives her an idea. Taking all her friends and her servants with her Miss Nealon goes to the chief of the gypsy band and pays him a goodly sum to go away and leave the camp with all its properties to the new owners. The party of young society folk are enjoying the simple life and the freedom of gypsy camp life when the county sheriff and his deputies descend upon them with a warrant which calls for the arrest of a band of gypsies charged with horse stealing. The haughty ladies and their escorts try their best to convince the official that they are not real gypsies, but their efforts are in vain and the party is lodged in the county jail. Mabel Nealon, the millionaire's five-year-old daughter, is recognized by one of the deputies, but the officers believe that she has been kidnapped by the band, and accordingly send for Mr. Nealon. When the millionaire arrives from his office in his motor car the party is set free and Mr. Nealon has a good laugh on them all the way back to the Nealon mansion, but when he opens the door there is a surprise awaiting him, for the gypsies have been trying to lead the simple life and have taken all the food in the place and nearly stripped the house of its expensive furnishings.

This film is a laugh-getter and no exhibitor should miss booking it. It will be released October 23d.

NICHOLS FORM CORPORATION.

Messrs. George C., Fred D. and William S. Nichols have formed a corporation for the conduct of their moving picture theaters in Grand Rapids and Flint, Michigan, under the name of the Superba Amusement Co. The company owns the Superba and Apollo moving picture theater in Grand Rapids, their home city, and also a picture house in Flint. The concern is capitalized at $10,000, of which $1,000 has been paid in cash and the balance of $9,000 is represented in property. George C. Nichols is president; Fred Nichols is secretary and treasurer. The incorporators of the company also constitute the board of directors.

SPRING THEATER, WEST HOBOKEN, N. J., SHORTLY TO OPEN.

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," reports that the West Hoboken Amusement Company will soon open their new Spring Theater in West Hoboken, N. J. They purchased from him two Power's No. 6A Motor Driven Machines, two Hallberg A. C. Economizers, and a full line of supplies. Mr. Hallberg also reports the sale of a Simplex M. P. machine to S. Cirrination, South Bethlehem, Pa., together with 260 opera chairs and full line of supplies; Hallberg A. C. Economizer, etc. Also an Edison Model B, M. P. machine, with Hallberg A. C. Economizer, to the Edisonia Theater, Durham. N. C.

Scene from Lubin Comedy, "The Substitute Heiress."

"THE SUBSTITUTE HEIRESS" (Lubin).

Arthur Johnson, the Lubin favorite leading man, has just completed a comedy picture, that will induce a laugh with one eye and a tear from the other. The idea is unique and the moral extremely truthful, it is a case of love without conditions and must compel admiration. James Stillman is invited to spend a few days at the country home of his broker, the broker's daughter to be the intended hostess, but unfortunately the young lady is booked for an automobile tour with a party of friends which will occupy several days. The matter is discussed by the party and in a spirit of jest they advise that Miss Winchester shall instruct her pretty maid Ruth to dress up and do the honors as the presiding Mistress of the house. Young Stillman arrives and Ruth receives him; she plays her role so well that James is cornered and falls desperately in love. The deception is kept very quiet and Stillman nurses his infatuation until one day he receives an invitation to Emily Winchester's wedding. Half broken hearted he resolves to attend. He sees the bride, but it is not the girl he loves. He is introduced and his surprise is not greater than others of the party who have never dreamed of the romance. Explanations, however, are in order and when James learns that the little maid is fancy free he rushes to the Manor house filled with joy and a proposition to marry. Ruth though love struck, had never dreamed that she could secure so charming a young gentleman. But love levels all conditions and the day was quickly fixed.

The Essanay Company are arranging to send a company of players to Ithaca, N. Y., for the purpose of securing some corking good football pictures at Cornell University. Theodore Wharton, director of the company, returned the past week from the East, after completing arrangements for the trip. Mr. Wharton has a number of excellent football scenarios on hand that will make splendid films with the hearty co-operation of the Cornell team.

THEY APPEAR IN "THE STARBUCKS."

A Notable Cast Supports Opie Read in the Picture Version of His Popular Story.

In its production of Opie Read's novel, "The Starbucks," the American Film Manufacturing Company has assembled a notable company of players to support Mr. Read, who appears in the role of "Jasper Starbuck." It is not on record that Mr. Read has attained the position of a star in the theatrical firmament, but we have the word of the American directors that he has proved to be an actor of no mean ability in the silent drama.

Others in the cast are: Clara Reynolds Smith, who has had a long experience in stock, plays "Mrs. Jasper Starbuck." William Lee impersonates the "Rev. Jim Starbuck," a lanky backwoods preacher. C. N. Devere takes the part of "Lige Peters." He has had fourteen years of dramatic experience, appearing in a number of the great successes of recent years.

Eugene Bonner displays excellent dramatic ability in his rendition of the part of "Judge Elliot." William A. Morse, juvenile lead, plays "Tom Elliott," the Judge's son. Lillian Logan plays the part of "Lou Starbuck." Maynon Steward is the "Mrs. Mayfield" of the story, the sister of Judge Elliot. All of these players are well known in the dramatic field and have many successful seasons to their credit.

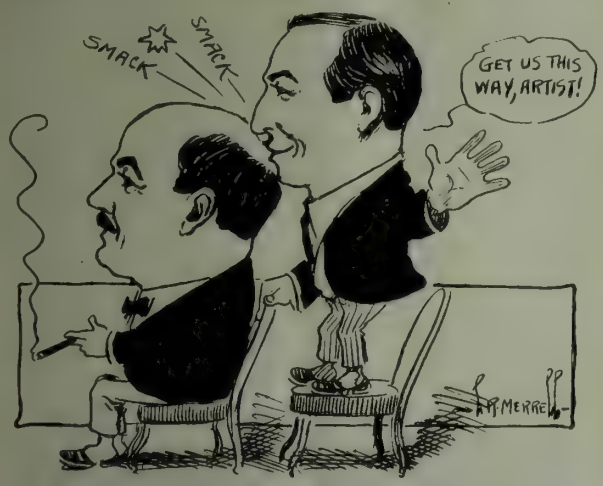
"CRYSTAL" GETS ANOTHER WELL-KNOWN ACTOR.

Another sterling actor who has made a name for himself in the theater, has joined the ranks of the Photoplayers. He is none other than Chester Barnett, and will appear exclusively in Crystal films. Mr. Barnett has appeared under the personal direction of Mr. David Belasco, supporting Miss Frances Starr, in the "Rose of the Rancho." He was also a member of Ben Greet's famous Company portraying leading Shakespearian roles. For two years he disported as the highly temperamental boy-musician in "The Climax."

Mr. Barnett's handsome face and figure and pleasing personality make him a great acquisition to the growing roll of clever actors in Crystal films.

PHILADELPHIA LEAGUE SMOKER.

The regular meeting of the Philadelphia Exhibitors' League was held at the headquarters, 142 N. 8th St. on Friday, October 11th, at which a smoker was held, attended by most of the exhibitors of the city in addition to a number of the exhibitors throughout the State of Pennsylvania. A large and varied program was rendered, in which a number of the members took part in addition to professional talent.



Chas. Segall and A. Spins in Their Great Act.

At the meeting a resolution was passed to vacate the present headquarters owing to lack of space and a large and more suitable place was selected at 13th and Vine streets, and all accommodations including phone service, at which the headquarters would be open from eight o'clock in the morning until 12 o'clock at night, during which time someone will always be in attendance, and in addition thereto, facilities will be provided for correspondence by the members, for which a stenographer will be available without charge.

EXCELLENT BASEBALL VIEWS.

An excellent set of slides covering the Championship Baseball Series between the Boston and New York teams has been produced by A. J. Clapham, whose advertisement relative to this subject appears in this issue. Mr. Clapham has selected the most interesting subjects for the set. The slides are produced with an interesting lecture or with full description on the slide. Attractive special one-sheet lithographs in colors are furnished free with each set. The slides are produced from genuine photographs and will prove a timely feature for exhibitors.

PURELY PERSONAL.

Sol. L. Lesser, of the Golden Gate Film Exchange, has been in town in consultation with the officials of the Film Supply Company of America.

George O. Nicholls, formerly of the Biograph, Thanhouser and Gem companies, has hooked up with Lubin as director. He began work on October 14.

Harry Harvey has resigned his position as director of Solax. In his sixteen years in the picture game, Mr. Harvey has had experience in all departments. It is understood he has several propositions under consideration.

The many friends and admirers of Earle Williams, of the Vitagraph Company, were interested in his appearance with the California company as the monk in "When California Was Young."

IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGE.

The Olympic Games at Stockholm, a three-reel Pathe feature, will be released by the General Film Company on October 24th. Pathe Freres had the exclusive motion picture privilege for these world-renowned events and allowed nothing of importance to escape the camera's eye.

The finish of each event is shown, as well as foregrounds of all the winners, foregrounds of the contending teams, the Parade of Nations, scenes along the course and the finish of the classic marathon, and the King of Sweden awarding the prizes. The Olympic Games demonstrated the superior ability of the American athlete, and as this touches the chord of patriotism in every American heart, it will draw the people in hordes to the theaters where it is exhibited.

"MAKING AN AMERICAN CITIZEN" (Solax).

A husband and wife, belonging to the most ignorant and lowest class of peasantry, where the husband is lord and master and the wife his servile slave, emigrate to the United States. On landing in New York, the husband loads a huge bundle on the back of his wife, and, carrying nothing but a rought walking-stick himself, starts to pass through the Battery, walking behind wife, who is bent nearly double with the weight stick. Soon a crowd gathers around them, some laughing, jeering, others indignant and threatening, until, suddenly, a huge American pushes his way through crowd, stops wife, takes bundle off her back, lays huge hand on shoulder of husband, bending him nearly double, picks up bundle, places on his back, and orders him to march on.

Scene from "Making an American Citizen" (Solax).

This is the husband's first lesson in Americanism. Other lessons follow, in which the husband is taught, with an emphasis he cannot doubt, American ways and manners, until after he has been arrested and sent to jail for beating his wife, he becomes thoroughly convinced that old world methods will not do in this strange new world and decides to become an American in spirit and in manners.

A transformation is also worked in the character and spirits of the wife. Her animal-like patience and servile docility gradually gave place to a spirit of independence, until, at last, she vigorously resents the brutality of her husband, and asserts her rights as an American woman.

The scenario closes with husband and wife working harmoniously together, each doing his or her proper share of the work.

THE NAVAL REVIEW IN NEW YORK.

On October 26th, in place of "The Light that Failed," Pathe Freres will release "The United States Armada," in one reel. Each of the one hundred and twenty-three war vessels is shown in this film in clear, sharp contrast against a background of the mountainous Palisades, which form the Western shore of the beautiful Hudson.

President Taft and Secretary of the Navy Meyer reviewing the greatest fleet of fighting craft ever assembled is also shown, the Pathe Freres camera having a point of vantage on the Mayflower, the President's yacht, during the ceremony.

THE GIANTS VS. THE RED SOX.

Pathe Freres secured the exclusive privilege of taking motion pictures of the World's Series. This year the struggle for the World's Baseball Championship was more bitterly contested than ever before, and the interest in the games has accordingly increased until there is not a man, woman, or child in the country who will not seize the opportunity to see the series on the screen. The film will be one reel in length and the release date will be announced in next week's issue.

CALL—ESSEX COUNTY, N. J., EXHIBITORS.

A meeting of Local No. 4, M. P. E. L. of N. J., which includes all exhibitors of Essex County, is called to take place at the Court Theater, corner of Market and High streets, Newark, N. J., Sunday, October 20, at 1:30 p.m. This will be an important meeting and steps to force political candidates to show their hands will be taken. The combined influence of the screens of the members will be intelligently brought to bear upon non-committal office seekers.

Kinemacolor In Travel Field

Expeditions Under Lawrence Grant Searching World's Beauty Spots—Some New Films.

ANOTHER field of competition recently entered into by President Henry J. Brock, of the Kinemacolor Company, is that of the illustrated travel talk. The general name of the new venture is "Travel by Kinemacolor," and the beauty spots of the world will be searched by the corps of experts maintained by the company, as well as by special expeditions directed by Lawrence Grant, who will be the star speaker in the travel department. Mr. Brock feels that he is the equal of any man in the field, and with perfect confidence enters him in the lists to bid for popular favor. On Monday evening, October 21st, in Tremont Temple, Boston, Mr. Grant will have his premier performance on the topic of "Yellowstone National Park and Crow Indian Celebrations."

Mr. Grant is well known in England as a speaker on topics pertaining to travel, and it was while in the United States making up a series of talks to be called "America Through

Mr. Grant at the Hymen Terraces, Yellowstone Park.

My Monocle" that arrangements were made for several Kinemacolor experts to accompany him on his tour of the wonderlands of the West. Heretofore Mr. Grant has relied simply on his brilliancy of word painting and ability to visualize far off lands to his audience without any such accessory as pictures. He was never satisfied with painted slides or the black-and-white pictures, but in Kinemacolor he saw his opportunity.

The Yellowstone, according to announcements, has never before been treated with such attention—it took Mr. Grant and the experts three months to make the series. The remainder of the past summer has been devoted to the Grand Canyon of Colorado and Glacier National Park, which will be shown in later presentations.

Mr. Grant was made a member of one of the chief tribes of the Crow Indians, and when this honor was bestowed on him, he was christened "Striped Elk" by the council of chiefs. This was not the name they called him. By common consent, on account of the little gold-rimmed monocle that seems inseparable from his left eye, he was called "One Eye in Eye." The primitive Americans were so delighted with the bit of glass that he sent through a hurried order to an optician in Salt Lake City, and so was able to present a monocle to each of the high chiefs who had so well aided him in making up the pictures of Indian life and who had arranged many ancient ceremonials in full costume to be perpetuated in the color camera.

Some New Kinemacolor Films.

The company is showing a new two-reel subject, "The Husband's Story," a drama with a moral. The story is of a husband who discovers the growing attachment between his wife and a mutual friend and takes a novel method of awakening the wife to her peril by relating a story of what happened many years before on the very spot he selects for the telling. The work has been well done. Due regard has been paid to the settings and to the costumes. The story is coherent and smooth. There are strong dramatic situations, and they are carefully directed—there is an entire absence of melodrama. The play opens with the wife and husband at breakfast on the lawn. After the husband has gone to business a friend appears. The two stroll to a bench by the side of a river. There is no question of the attachment between the two. They return to the house and the wife goes to her room to prepare for a walk. As the two start out the husband returns unexpectedly. He joins them and suggests a visit to the "mysterious house."

The trio go to the ruins of a mansion and clamber among the debris. The husband seats himself between the wife and the friend and tells the story of the crumbling ruin. The scene dissolves and we are in a period of other days. In the absence of a husband his wife has entertained a male friend. On the unexpected return of the husband the friend takes refuge in a closet. The husband has an idea there is someone there, but the wife on a crucifix swears there is not. The husband sends for bricklayers and directs them to close the closet—to wall it up. Flashes show the consternation on the faces of the wife of the story teller and the friend as the story proceeds. The end of the tale is of the death of the man in the closet and the collapse and death of the wife. The friend who has listened to the recital retires from the little group. The husband and wife embrace.

shell and "the birth of an ostrich." Other pictures show the chick a day old, three weeks old and the full-grown bird; the capture of the ostrich and the clipping of the feathers. Also there is a view of the finished plumes, in all colors, and this is a picture that will especially appeal to the feminine portion of any audience.

"The Haunts of an Otter" shows these sleek animals both above and below the surface, how they catch fish and fight over them.

"Cairo, Egypt," is a fine scenic. One view is a panoramic picture, showing the pyramids in the distance. There are street scenes, views of parks and of the tombs of the kaliffs, of a great bridge and of the British horse artillery on parade. There is a flash of a sunset over the city, Old Sol shining faintly on one of the pyramids. It is a splendid scene.

"Bathing at Ostend" and "Scenes at Manley Beach, New South Wales, Australia," give fine views at these famous resorts. They are particularly interesting in one aspect—showing the difference in the standards of bathing costumes between these places and the more famous American watering places.

BIGGEST THING IN BIG NEW YORK.

It Will Be the Grand Annual Reception Given by the New York Exhibitors' Association.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New York are giving their Second Annual Entertainment and Ball on November 14, 1912, at Palm Garden, 58th Street, between Lexington and Third Avenues.

The New York exhibitors are a strong, healthy organization and are desirous of celebrating their success by entertaining themselves and their friends and the trade in general at a splendid function which will tax the capacity of Palm Garden. They have a twofold object in giving this function. One reason is the sociability amongst themselves and the other reason is their desire to be correctly understood, as to their moral and business integrity which has been unjustly assailed, principally on the outside, by would-be reformers.

Much praise is due Mr. A. Coleman and members of the entertainment committee for the excellence of the preparations which are practically complete. Financially, the affair is already a success as exhibitors has disposed of a great number of tickets and the trade have been surprisingly liberal in patronizing the expensive souvenir program, ten thousand of which will be given out to exhibitors throughout the United States. Preceding the dancing there will be a high-class vaudeville entertainment; "big time" entertainment of the most refined class have been engaged. A number of pre-released pictures will be shown. The music for the occasion will be furnished by a band of twenty pieces; prominent members of civic societies and well-known public officials, representing all state and city departments, have been invited. Nearly all photoplay stars have signified their intention of being present.

Mr. Maurice Costello and Miss Florence Lawrence have promised to lead the grand march. In moving picture circles there is no doubt that the exhibitors' reception is the event of the year. All the eastern film manufacturers have already secured boxes and will be present in person and many notable men in the trade, representing both Licensed and Independent interests, will mingle that evening for the first time since our ball of last year. The reception will eclipse anything for size and general éclat for some time to come. It is going to be a great success and any motion picture man who misses it will surely regret having done so. All exhibitors throughout the state and those on the Jersey side of the Hudson and quite a number from Pennsylvania are coming in large numbers.

The national president, Mr. Neff, and Mr. Christenson, national secretary, will be in New York on November 10th and stay until after the ball.

ALL SUITS ARE OFF.

Amicable Settlement of the Litigation Between the New York Motion Picture Company and the Universal Company Effected.

Announcement is made in the advertising pages of this issue of the Moving Picture World by both parties to the litigation that all suits between the New York Motion Picture Company and the Universal Film Manufacturing Company have been settled and discontinued. These actions arose out of the withdrawal of the New York interests from the Universal Company.

Both sides are claiming a victory, which would indicate that all parties are fully satisfied with the termination of the contest and the terms of settlement. It is reported that Messrs. Baumann and Kessell made a cash payment of $17,500, relinquished their right to the trade-mark "Bison" and "'101'-Bison" and returned some $400,000 worth of securities which represented the price paid for the New York Company's interests when it was purchased by the Universal. The New York Company retains its right and title to the several properties in litigation which it was supposed to have turned in to the Universal when the consolidation was made.

As regards the Universal Company, it will now proceed as though the New York Company had never been a party to its formation, with the exception that it now owns the "Bison" trade mark. The New York Company will introduce a new brand to be known as "K-B," and all future pictures made by that company will be so marked. New contracts have been made with Miller Brothers for the use of their ranch and wild-west outfit and the work of making pictures will be resumed without further interference or recourse to law.

This settlement is one that will be hailed with joy by all exhibitors.

Then play "It's Somebody Else" until "I leave to-morrow." Then play a few measures of "Good-Bye, Little Girl, Good-Bye," "Give My Regards to Broadway" and "I Won't Be Back 'Til August" until "My ticket, please." Then play "My Heart Has Learned to Love You, So Do Not Say Good-Bye" until "The heart breaks; truth must out." Then play "Any Little Girl That's a Nice Little Girl Is the Right Little Girl for Me," and "Sweetest Story Ever Told" until "And together they took the road to happiness." Then play "It's a Long Lane That Has No Turning" until end of picture.

NOVEL SETTING IN UNIVERSAL SUBJECT.

"A Fight for Friendship," recently produced under the direction of Thomas Ricketts, is a "feature" one-reel production in which over 300 men appear. The setting for the transportation tunnel is one of the biggest things ever attempted and is realistic in the extreme.

Mr. George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Company, returned from Philadelphia the past week. Two days spent in the Quaker city were plenty, according to Mr. Spoor's reports, and he slept soundly all the while. Great place for insomnia, that.

PICTURES HELP MAKE GOVERNORS.

Evident of the part the Gaumont Weekly takes in the moulding of public opinion and of its value in foretelling the future is the fact that in its issue No. 5, released April 5th, was published a picture of William Sulzer, naming him as a probable candidate for the governorship of New York State on the Democratic ticket. That these pictures, viewed by thousands in the Empire state and elsewhere did much to form opinion and influence minds toward the selection of Congressman Sulzer for gubernatorial honors, is indubitable. It illustrates the power of a new press. It also exemplifies modernity in prophecy. In earlier days prophecy could only be heralded orally. With the advent of the printing press, it crept into cold type. Now we have the face of the man and fragments of his life seen, weighed and decided upon by the people who have power to make him.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ENGLAND.

IT has been rumored of late that exhibitions of moving pictures are soon to be given in the old Warren Avenue Baptist Church, at the corner of Warren Avenue and Clarendon Street. Nothing definite has been given out, but it is known that Boston moving picture interests are willing to pay a stiff price for the location, which is in a thickly settled portion of the city.

The Witch Theater, Salem, Mass., William Gane's new theater, had its opening performance on September 7, and big business was the rule. The Witch, which is a brand new house from cellar to roof, is playing to vaudeville and first-run pictures. Three shows are given daily. A complete change of program is offered twice each week, and there is every reason to believe that the house should prosper.

It is announced that Mr. Julius Cahn, the New England theatrical manager, has secured the exclusive rights for the moving pictures of "Queen Elizabeth," for the New England States.

Manager Arthur E. Lord, of the Olympia Theater, Lynn, Mass., is having a most encouraging run of trade. The regular winter programs of vaudeville and pictures have met with ready response, and seats are often at a premium, even though the Olympic has a seating capacity in excess of 3,000.

On Monday, September 16, the Lynn Theater, Lynn, Mass., opened for the season, and found business good. Mr. Jeff Callan is again at his duties as manager, and offers vaudeville and pictures. Mr. Callan pulled his house through last season as a winner, and may be expected to do the same this season.

Mr. J. F. Boylen is pushing the work along on his new theater, Taunton, Mass., which he hopes to have completely finished by December 1. Seating well over one thousand, Mr. Boylen intendes to own a first-class theater, to play vaudeville and pictures, and he is not sparing expense to secure it.

Mr. M. C. Blumenberg, manager of the Casco Theater, Portland, Me., states that he is finding business excellent, and had a word of praise for John Myers, a soloist of marked ability. Licensed pictures are shown at the Casco.

Another Portland house, the Big Nickle, managed by William Reeves, is experiencing a nice fall trade. The four-reel feature production, "The Resurrection," featuring Blanche Walsh, made a big hit with the patrons of this house.

The end of this month saw the Poli Theater, of Springfield, Mass., playing to vaudeville and photoplays.

Mr. R. T. Smith has opened his new Mirror Theafter, Springfield, Mass. The house is well located on Wilbraham Road, and is an up-to-date theater in every respect. Since its opening, September 2, Mr. Smith has found business brisk.

The Bijou Theater, Fall River, Mass., has been opened to the public, after most extensive alterations were made. The entire foyer and auditorium have been improved, and the house now presents a most attractive appearance. Newly decorated and painted, the Bijou has been playing to big audiences, that evidently approve of the programs of vaudeville and pictures. The Bijou is under new management this year, and the change seems to have been a good one. Manager M. H. Goodhue is determined to make his house a winner.

The Academy and Premier Theaters, both of Fall River, and both managed by Mr. Louis M. Boas, are doing very well.

The Majestic Theater, of Keene, N. H., is now out of the ranks of vaudeville and pictures, after a stay of nearly three years. This house is now giving stock-company attractions.

The Bijou Realty Trust Company, of Springfield, Mass., has finally secured permission to enlarge its Bijou Theater. It is stated that approximately $100,000 will be spent in the enlargement, and general improvement of the theater, which is to be a model house.

Mr. Sam Messing, who formerly was associated with a New York vaudeville agent, is now assistant manager of Loew's Orpheum Theater, Boston. Sam is a Boston boy, and has a reputation of being a hustler.

It is understood that the Goldstein Brothers Amusement Company, of Springfield, Mass., are intending to build a theater in that city to seat 1,000 people. The plans call for an outlay of $75,000, for a theater to be devoted to vaudeville and photoplays.

It is rumored that Nathan Gordon, of the Gordon Brothers' Amusement Company, will soon ereet a new theater in Milford, Mass.

A new incorporation is the Empire Theater Company, of Chelsea, Mass. This corporation intends to build a theater in that city, to be devoted to vaudeville and pictures. Plans are now being prepared.

The Back Bay Theater, corner of Darthmouth and Columbus Avenue, has been renamed the Columbus Theater. Considerable money has been used to beautify the house, and the lobby and auditorium now present a most attractive appearance. Pictures from the Mutual Corporation seem to hit the mark in good fashion, and business is quite brisk.

Manager Thompson, of the Emmett Hall Theater, Jamaica Plains, Mass., has reopened his house and reports that business is distinctly good with him. The Emmett Theater uses Licensed service, from the Boston office of the General Film Company.

The Superb Theater, Roxbury Crossing, Boston, has switched from Licensed service to the Mutual's product, and seems to be well satisfied with the change. The Supreme Theater, of Jamaica Plains, Mass., which is owned by the same corporation that controls the Superb Theater, is still using Licensed pictures. The Washington and Old South Theaters, of Boston, both owned by the same corporation, were using Independent service, until the owners decided to switch one of them over to the Licensed side. They were informed that they must turn both houses over to the Licensed camp, or neither. The result was that the theaters remained Independent.

Mr. Charlie Sheafe, well known throughout the New England trade, as a moving picture man, has left that territory to open a theater in Stamford, Conn. Mr. Sheafe made good in New Hampshire and Massachusettss, and no doubt will pull out a winner in his new location.

The Washington Theater, Boston, reduced its admission price to five cents the other week, but only for a couple of days. This was noted in these columns, so that it is only fair to say that the price is back again at its regular amount.

Mr. Buckstein, formerly with the Great Eastern Film Company, of New York, has succeeded Ralph Pinkham, as booking manager of the Mutual Corporation's Boston offices, 32 Boylston Street. Mr. Buckstein has jumped into popularity with the managers. Mr. Pinkham is now in charge of the Mutual's shipping department.

The Jolliette Theater, Bowdoin Square, Boston, which has been closed for some time, due to poor business, reopened Monday, September 30, under the control of Hodgson and Cardios. Licensed service is used. The house has been renamed the "Empire."

Manager Louis Goldburg, of the Gem Theater, East Boston, finds it impossible to open on scheduled time. The new house will present a fine appearance when it is completed and should do a good business.

Manager Joe Mack, of the Hub Theater, Boston, is back on the job, after a vacation spent in the Provinces. Mr. Mack is looking finely, and says he is ready for the game. Vaudevile has been added to the programs again, and business is good. This house cut vaudeville from its programs during the summer.

A new theater is to be erected on Bridge Street, Westbrook, Me. The theater will be a moving picture house, and is being promoted by the Portland Amusement Company.

The Lyric Theater, Dover, N. H., found it well worth its while to have featured the three-reel subject, "Redemption," as the increased business easily made up for the advance in price asked for this feature.

September 16 was the anniversary date of the National Theater, Boston, the house being one year old. The theater offered a special bill during that week. The National is doing very nicely and Manager Haley stated that the one-year-old "baby" was doing "great." The National seats 4,000, and is a B. F. Keith theater, playing vaudeville and pictures.

Novumbega Park, Auburndale, Mass., was closed by Manager Alberte on September 15, after one of the most prosperous seasons in the history of the Park.

A Massachusetts State Inspector says that Needham, Mass., will soon have a theater, to be devoted to vaudeville and pictures. This is of more than ordinary interest, due to the fact that Needham has always been distinctly opposed to moving pictures, and invariably refused to grant licenses for this purpose.

"Kid" Harris is a great favorite with the managers using the service of the Mutual Corporation of Boston, and is counted as being one of the best operators in New England. The "Kid" was formerly with the General Film Company's Boston office. All the advance showings of pictures at the Mutual office are run off by "Kid," who is always ready to go out of his way to help the managers out.

A gang of film pirates are operating in New England, and are duping reels very frequently. The titles of feature pictures are changed and then the reels are offered to managers at low prices. It is understood that New York detectives are looking into the matter and exhibitors are hereby warned against booking pictures from unknown parties.

The first Broncho release, "Sundered Ties," made good with New England managers, many of whom grabbed the picture. Mr. George Appleby, manager of the Star Theater, of Boston, featured the reel to good results. Keystone films also attracted much attention, as the members of the Keystone Film Company are all well known to local managers.

Mr. William Bradstreet has arranged with C. F. Atkinson to present a series of travel talks, with illustrated slides and moving pictures, in his chain of Scenic Temple Theaters throughout New England, including Boston, Cambridge, Waltham, Lowell, Malden and Providence. These travel talks are the ones prepared by Mr. Fred Niblo, as Mr. Atkinson has purchased the entire entertainment from Mr. Niblo, when the latter departed for Australia. Mr. Atkinson is allowed to use Mr. Niblo's name in advertising the talks, which is of great benefit, since Mr. Niblo is well known in these parts. The engagement started on September 30, at Mr. Bradstreet's Auditorium Theater in Malden, Mass. The writer understands that the "Nine Travel Talks," as they were billed by Mr. Niblo, includes 30,000 feet of moving pictures, and 1,500 illustrated slides. Mr. Atkinson will cut the talks down to six, giving one each day. This is distinctly an educational note, and Mr. Bradstreet should be complimented on his latest move.

Col. Willard G. Stanton reports that the Auditorium Theater, Fitchburg, Mass., is doing nicely. Manager Stanton is managing the house for Harry Katzes, of Lynn, Mass. Vaudeville and pictures are offered, and business is very good.

The "Durbar" in Kinemacolor came to an end at Tremont Temple, September 28. This brought to a close the most remarkable run moving pictures ever enjoyed in this city, as the Durbar was on exhibition for five months, at admission prices ranging up to 75 cents. The coronation pictures, which were so successful here last year, were shown as soon as the "Durbar" closed. Boston is very strong for Kinemacolor.

The Municipal Theater, of Northampton, Mass., the "Academy of Music," will soon change managers, as Miss Charlotte Bannon, of Portsmouth, Ohio, is due to take up the reins, as Manager Potter has accepted another position.

The Cambridge Theater, Cambridge, Mass., was opened September 23, under the management of Harold R. Chase, who succeeds Mr. William Landle, whose death came last summer. Mr. Chase has secured control of the theater, but this will his first attempt as manager. Manager Chase is a native of Cambridge.

The Queen Theater, Manchester, N. H., which opened early in September, is doing very well, according to Manager W. L. Noyes. Manager Noyes has a good reputation as a show man, and should make a winner out of the Queen, which is a cozy theater, playing a straight picture show.

Massabesic Park, near Manchester, N. H., closed recently after a good season.

Mr. Stephen J. Breen has been transferred to Poli's New Theater, Bridgeport, Conn. Manager Breen had been in charge of the Poli Theater, Springfield, Mass., for three years before the transfer. Mr. Gordon Wrighter is now in charge of the Springfield house. Manager Wrighter comes from Wilkes-Barre, Pa., where he managed the local Poli house.

It has been definitely announced that Mr. S. Z. Poli is to start work imediately on a large theater in Springfield, Mass. The location chosen is Main and Worthington Streets, just opposite the postoffice. No further information has as yet been given out.

Manager W. D. Ascough, of the Poli Theater, Hartford, Conn., discontinued his stock-company attractions on September 28, and replaced them with vaudeville and pictures.

The Educational Film and Exhibition Company staged a photoplay in Waterbury, Conn., recently, in which Miss Annie Hart was injured.

Lake Nipmuc Park, Milford, Mass., was closed this week by Manager Dan J. Sprague, after an unusually good summer season, devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville.

Manager Thomas H. Cullen finds that good pictures and illustrated songs are amply sufficient to pack his Dream Theater, Cliftondale, Mass., and has decided not to use any vaudeville in his programs.

Manager Ralph Ward, of the Opera House, of Lowell, Mass., is giving shows of vaudeville and pictures on Sunday evenings, although the Opera House plays high-class road attractions during the week. The attendance at these Sunday concerts is very good indeed.

Miss Nellie Hurd has purchased the Alhambra Theater, Lowell, Mass., and will play picture programs, after making some alterations in the house. Universal films were chosen by Miss Hurd for the Alhambra.

Mr. W. S. Wallace, manager of Riverside Park, near Springfield, Mass., brought a most prosperous season to a close, and was presented with a gold watch by the employes of the Park.

The Edisonia Theater, Springfield, Mass., is doing very well, and Mr. A. F. Smith, the proprietor, also reports that his new Mirror Theater, of Springfield, is a money maker. Mr. A. W. Atkins is managing both houses. The Mirror Theater was named from the fact that a "Mirror" screen is used, and Manager Atkins is much pleased with it. The Edisonia Theater also boasts of a mirror screen.

Another handsome theater is to be added to Boston's list. It is to be known as the Huntington Avenue Theater and occupies the property at 177 Huntington Avenue, formerly known as the Century Building. The new house threw open its doors on Monday afternoon, September 23. On Sunday afternoon, the 22nd, there was a private inspection, which many prominent city officials and business men were invited to attend. The theater, which is unique in design, and fireproof in every detail, presents a striking appearance. The foyer is of marble, and makes an imposing entrance. The management of this theater is under the control of the H. E. Jones Amusement Company. Mr. Jones has had much experience in the theatrical line, both in Boston and elsewhere, and it is his intention to present only the best of photoplays and vaudeville. The general color scheme is soft and attractive; the wall decoration giving the effect of old Spanish leather, with its beautifully blended browns and greens. One of the most remarkable features of the new theater is the fact that an absolutely fireproof building has been built within the four walls and roof of another structure, during which all the business in the other portions of the building has been carried out without interruption. Work was started on the theater early in July, and it was only by rushing that the theater was ready so early. This house is the outcome of a very much smaller house, operated by Mr. Jones, in the same location. When the original theater was opened, failure was predicted, because of the fact that the location was in the residential section. However, good shows of Licensed service made good, which explains the large theater now built.

A novel use for moving picture theaters has been found by Representative McInerney, of Boston, who is contesting Senator Timilty, for the latter's seat in the Senate. Mr. McInerney is not conducting any rallies, but relies on the photoplay theaters to present his cause to the public. Representative McInerney takes the part of a lecturer, at free moving picture shows, the expense for which he bears. A series of pictures taken by Mr. McInerney in Ireland, and lectured on by him, regular reels, and vaudeville, make up a very good show, and one which is invariably packed. Mr. McInerney presents slides stating that he is a candidate for Senator and also gives the spectators handbills that are expected to help his case along. Mr. McInerney feels that his campaign is very effective, and far superior to the usual campaign methods.

Kellmann's Feature Films are well on their way to becoming general favorites in the New England territory. Headquarters are at 665 Washington Street, Boston, where three features weekly have caught on in good shape.

The Gem Theater, formerly Commonwealth Hall, East Boston, Mass., is the latest theater in that city, and was opened on Monday, September 30, at 7 P. M. The Gem Theater intends to offer a high grade of moving pictures, vaudeville and illustrated songs. Matinee performances are to be given daily at 3 o'clock. Admission is five cents. Evening performances will be continuous from 7 to 10:30, with admission at ten cents. Programs will be changed on Monday and Tuesday. This house has been renovated and greatly improved, and should do a nice business.

The Bowdoin Square Theater, Boston, has instituted a girls' popularity contest, to run until November 23. The prizes are to consist of a diamond ring, a gold watch, and a five-dollar gold piece. Business is expected to be stimulated by this contest

Gane's Witch Theater of Salem, Mass., has had a most satisfactory opening, and is using service from the Mutual Corporation's Boston office. Programs are changed on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays. Mr. Harry M. Livingstone is business manager of the Witch.

Newspaper advertising is being used very extensively by the Salem Mass., moving picture and vaudeville houses. For instance, in the Salem News of September 27, the writer noted that the Witch Theater used a five-inch triple column advertisement. The Salem Theater, which shows pictures and vaudeville, used a similar amount of space. The Comique Theater of Salem, and the Olympic of Peabody, Mass., also were represented, although the space was much smaller. As this course has been pursued regularly by these houses, it is obvious that the thing is successful.

Mr. P. L. McMahon, manager of the Empire Theater, Hartford, Conn., reports that his house is doing very well with a daily change of films.

Mr. G. E Moore has leased the Town Hall, at Holliston, Mass., and intends to run performances of moving pictures and illustrated songs during the coming season. Mr. Moore also will operate the Town Hall at Hopkinton, Mass.

The new Boylen Theater Taunton, Mass., is now very nearly completed, and the finishing work is being hurried as much as possible, in order that the theater may benefit by the fall trade.

A new incorporation is the Bijou Amusement Company of Gardner, Mass. The concern is incorporated for $5,000, and its members are: Herbert S. Davis, Frank H. Wotton and Herbert S. Davis, Jr.

Owing to the steady growth in membership, the Boston Theatrical Stage Employees Union has voted to secure headquarters in a more central location. Several ushers employed in various theaters conferred with the officers of the Union as to the possibility of an ushers' Union, affiliated with the International Stage Employees' Union.

Manager Hoffman of Poli's Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., has resigned his position in order to associate himself with the William Morris enterprises.

"The Coronation," in Kinemacolor, with Mr. Harold Mead as lecturer, was revived at Tremont Temple, Boston, on Monday afternoon, September 30. Last year these pictures attained great popularity here and ran for six months at the same house. The management claims that they will be better than ever now, because a motor-driven machine has been substituted for the hand-driven one.

Mr. Louis M. Boas is about the busiest manager in these parts, as he is managing the Premier, Savoy and Academy theaters of Fall River, Mass.

Monday evening, September 30 saw the initial performance at the new Poli Theater, Worcester, Mass. This house is called the one million dollar theater, and it certainly is the last word in theater construction. Mr. S. Z. Poli has employed Mr. Joseph C. Criddle as resident manager. Vaudeville and photoplays are to constitute the programs. This is the second Poli theater in Worcester, but the old house plays to stock-company attractions.

Mr. William Fox is making good the announcement of his intention to invade the New England field with his brand of vaudeville and picture theaters. Mr. Fox evidently intends to camp right along side of the Poli and Loew theaters. Having secured theaters in Hartford, Conn., and Springfield, Mass., Mr. Fox now states that Waterbury, Conn., is next on his list as he has leased a new theater in that city just built by Mr. J. A. O'Neill. This house has a seating capacity of about 2,000, and is centrally located on the main thoroughfare. Mr. Poli owns the Jacques Theater in Waterbury. Vaudeville and pictures will hold forth at the new Fox Theater.

Mr. Frank H. Bigelow, owner of White City Park, Lake Quinsigamond, near Worcester, Mass., intends to build a new summer theater on the site of the present White City Casino. This house will be built during the winter.

Mr. B. F. Keith's new theater at St. John, N. B., is now nearly completed, and has been named the Imperial.

Manager "Nate" Brown of the Broadway Theater, Everett, Mass., caused O. J. Matthews to be arrested because the young man was in a way breaking up the show at the Broadway, due to his loud laughter, and general loud conduct. Matthews was tried by Judge Bruce in the Malden District Court and was ordered to pay a fine of $25, or to stay away from all theaters for a month.

Manager Brown added a balcony to his house, and greatly improved the lobby. The house is one of the best appointed houses in its class in New England.

Boston is now having an electrical show that is quite the largest thing of its kind that has ever been attempted here. As is fitting, the moving picture is well to the front, and one of the most interesting things at the show at the Mechanics' Building, is a reel of pictures showing the making of a metropolitan daily newspaper. These pictures were taken in the several departments of the Boston American. Reporters are shown coming in with their "stories," writing them out and turning them in to the editor. Telegraph machines, copy readers, etc., are shown. The composing, the stereotyping and art rooms are in the reel, and also a vivid picture of the big presses in action. When the writer visited the show, these pictures were the center of interest.

HENRY.

LOUISVILLE.

THE RESURRECTION,' Tolstoi's masterpiece, with Blanche Walsh in the leading role, ran into slight trouble at Lexington, Ky., recently, when County Judge J. Percy Scott announced that he would not permit the presentation of the film. After a consultation, and witnessing the exhibition, Judge Scott and other officials decided to permit the showing of the film, provided that children and girls under 18, unaccompanied by their parents, be barred from attending. The exhibitors of Lexington complied with the conditions and the performances ran off smoothly. The film was shown in Louisville recently and aroused only favorable comment. The famous actress appeared at her best in "The Resurrection," according to critics, and the film was one of the heaviest business-pullers seen in the Kentucky metropolis for some time. Lexington officials seem to be unnecessarily stirred up, due to the fact that one or two pictures, which have never been reviewed by the National Board of Censorship, have been shown in the Fayette city.

Joseph Shrader, now manager of the Central Film Exchange of Indianapolis, was a recent visitor in Louisville. He announced the departure of L. Beck, formerly manager of the Central, to a position with the Universal, with quarters in St. Louis.

William H. Wassman, owner of the Crystal and Rex motion picture theaters in Nashville, Tenn., has taken over the lease on the Grand Theater, in that city. The Grand has been in disuse for several months, the lease being held by Jake Wells. The latter had intended to stage vaudeville at the Grand, but the venture fell through. Mr. Wassman has not yet decided what disposition he will make of his new house, though he is contemplating using the theater for musical offerings at low prices. Mr. Wassman is one of the first to enter the moving picture field in the Tennessee capital, and is a pioneer of the business.

Max Simons, owner of the Hippodrome Theater, Louisville, has announced that contemplated improvements in that house will be held in abeyance until the turn of the year, at which time they will be rushed through. The seating capacity will be increased by the installation of a balcony, according to present plans.

C. E. Hampson, formerly manager of the Novelty Theater, Louisville, is experiencing gratifying success as an exhibitor in his own interest. Mr. Hampson is now owner of the Victoria, in New Albany, Ind. Mr. Hampson recently installed a Beck piano-player in his house.

The Broadway Amusement Company, of Louisville, is planning improvements in the West Broadway Theater at Eighteenth and Broadway. It has been found that the present conditions will not admit of the installation of the new Wurtlitzer Orchestrion, which has been ordered. The theater will be altered to admit of the new instrument, while the seating capacity also will be increased. The West Broadway is one of the most popular of the theaters in that section of the city. The advertising of the theater is a bit out of the ordinary. The electric sign which stands in front of the house is one of the largest in Kentucky, and may be seen for blocks.

No decision has yet been reached by the lessees of the property at Fourth Street and Broadway, Louisville, as to the nature of the structure to be erected. Various plans have been announced, but later statements always annulled all previous ones. It is believed, however, that some kind of an amusement building will be constructed.

Judge Allen Kinney, secretary and treasurer of the Princess Amusement Company of Louisville, is again at work after undergoing an operation at the Jewish Hospital recently. Judge Kinney was taken ill suddenly and rushed to the Jewish Hospital, where an abdominal operation was performed. The well-known moving picture magnate went through the ordeal in good shape, and made a rapid recovery.

Michael Switow, Simon Switow and Ernest Carpenter, are the incorporators of the Advance Film Manufacturing Company, which has been formed with a capitalization of $5,000. The company will manufacture industrial and educational films, operating chiefly in Kentucky. Spectacles in various neighboring cities will be covered. The Advance Company will have offices at 214 West Market Street, above the Crystal Theater.

A. F. Mayer has been appointed Southern representative of the Central Film Exchange of Indianapolis. Mr. Mayer will cater to numerous Louisville houses, including the Novelty, Westonia, Empire and Grand, of New Albany, besides supplying Michael Switow with eight reels daily. The Swanson-Crawford Film Exchange of St. Louis, formerly represented by Mr. Mayer, has withdrawn from Louisville. Mr. Mayer will maintain offices in the Tyler Building.

The Consolidated Theatres Company has opened the Princess Theater in Earlington, Ky. The new house has a seating capacity of about 400. C. R. Carsens is resident manager. Work on the new house in Central City, to be known as the Empire, is progressing rapidly and will be put into operation some time this month. Thomas Murphy will manage the Empire. E. E. Hollis is field representative for the Consolidated, and will spend his time in attending to the company's affairs in Kentucky and elsewhere.

"Tom Butler" was the most recent sensation in Louisville, the three-reel Eclair feature being presented by the Majestic Theater. The subject aroused much favorable discussion. The film was gripping from start to finish and held its audience from the beginning.

Moving picture houses of Jeffersonville, Ind., have been ordered to bar children from attending until the end of the present diphtheria epidemic.

The Executive Committee of the Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League met in Louisville on October 15 and planned for the annual meeting of the organization to be held in Louisville early in 1913. President J. H. Stamper, of Lexington, Ky., presided at the gathering, which took place at the Seelbach Hotel. The Louisville Photoplay Association acted as hosts to the visitors, entertaining them at a banquet at the Seelbach. Conditions of moment to the members of the organization were discussed. The Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League is growing rapidly, after a rather slow start. Exhibitors of the Bluegrass State did not take kindly to the organization primarily, but after learning its objects they became enthused and those who do not now belong are in the minority. Officers of the League are enthusiastic over prospects of its being one of the leading State organizations of the country.

Miss Grace Lear, probably the most popular vocalist in Louisville moving picture circles, has left Louisville for a short vacation. Miss Lear's place at the Majestic is being temporarily filled by Mrs. Olive D. Scharf and Joseph C. Ramser, two well-known singers.

A. J. Wagner, formerly ticket man at the Novelty Theater, has returned to Louisville after a summer's vacation. Mr. Wagner is something over seven feet in height, and gazes benignly down from an elevation unoccupied by ordinary folk. Mr. Wagner has not yet decided to resume his former connection.

The Buckingham Theater of Louisville, hitherto the home of burlesque, exclusively, has made a concession to moving pictures by utilizing a reel at each performance. The animated pictures will be a feature through the entire winter. Whallen Brothers, considered among the most astute business men of the Kentucky city, are the owners of the Buckingham.

The strike of musicians employed by Louisville exhibitors is still on, though the casual observer is probably ignorant of the fact. The musicians have not yet asked for their positions, while the exhibitors are using automatic pianos with success. Houses which cling to vaudeville are employing amateur players who are expert enough at the keys to provide suitable accompaniment for the various acts. The majority, however, are giving their patrons straight moving pictures, and are filling the houses with the films without the frills.

The Majestic Theater has resumed the use of advertising slides. Manager Louis J. Dittmar discontinued the slides during the early summer, believing that they were distasteful to patrons. This opinion has been changed, however, and advertisers are paying fancy prices for the privilege of having their names and lines appear on the screen. Mr. Dittmar, it should be added, uses only a limited number. G. D. CRAIN, JR.

SAN FRANCISCO.

THE Republic theater, which has hitherto made no special effort to advertise the pictorial end of its program, began showing on Sunday, Sept. 29th, the four-reel feature "Resurrection" and has advertised that picture in every possible way. The house manager, M. Lebobitz, states that 72 eight sheets and 800 three sheets have been placed, in addition to the unusual newspaper advertising. The "Resurrection" was booked for the entire week, although the vaudeville acts were changed on Wednesday. This would seem to indicate that the "small time" vaudeville circuits in the West are awakening to the fact that real feature motion pictures are a better drawing card than the average vaudeville attraction. It will be remembered that other local vaudeville houses have featured a photodrama at their several houses within the past month, they being: the Empress, the two Pantages houses and the American. Manager Grauman of the Empress states that "Queen Elizabeth," with Mme. Bernhardt in the title role, exceeded all his expectations, although that picture was on during one of the recent record breaking weeks of warm weather. The Pantages exhibited a film with an explanatory lecture, showing the Indianapolis auto races, which were conducted last May. That picture was "headlined" during the week's run at both the San Francisco and the Oakland Pantages houses. The American Theater immediately after its reopening by Goey Bros. featured the "Abernathy Kids." Another popular priced vaudeville house, which advertises moving pictures in conjunction with vaudeville, is the Portola. That theater does not specialize any particular picture as a feature, but places the regular A B C Company posters in the same frames that the photos of the acts are contained in. This friendly attitude toward the moving picture on the part of the theaters avowedly in the vaudeville game, is growing and the managers thereof are to be congratulated upon their change of spirit.

Mr. Murry Steele, who was manager of the Kinemacolor California interests, met with his death by poison in this city on the night of Sept. 28th. Mr. Steele was well known by theatrical people both here and in Los Angeles, he having had at one time an interest in a motion picture house in the Southern City before becoming connected with the Kinemacolor Company. He was unmarried and was the son of Dr. A. J. Steele of St. Louis, where the young man attended school before going to the Chicago University. He took charge of the Kinemacolor affairs last November and continued until the time of his death. The body was sent to the parents home for interment in St. Louis.

Mr. Metcalf just received a large shipment of parts for the Edison and Power's machines. Six million tickets were also stacked on his shelves. O. Christensen's Auburn, Cal., theater has just been supplied by Mr. Metcalf with a 1913 Motiograph and a "Formastat."

At last week's meeting the directors of the Moving Picture Exhibitors League of San Francisco, a report of the Convention Committee was given, the figures showing that that meeting was practically self-supporting. The total expense was about $1,600.00, the largest single expense being for a special train and incidental expenses on the day of the trip to the Essanay studio at Niles Canyon, which ran up beyond the five hundred dollar mark. As a whole the convention paid for itself, considerable revenue being derived from the advertising inserted in the official program and also from the floor space occupied in the Hall by the different supply houses. The subject of a special rate of insurance for moving picture houses was also brought up at this meeting and the secretary was instructed to communicate with Eastern officials to secure forms, rates, etc., so that members of the Moving Picture Exhibitors League of California might derive still further benefit from their association with that League.

Wobber Bros. report the unprecedented success of their "Queen Elizabeth" feature which has been shown at the Empress theater, San Francisco, the Victory theater, San Jose, and the Yosemite theatre, Stockton, where it is now playing. A booking of twelve days has been secured at the Macdonough theater in Oakland, where an advanced price of admission will prevail. Requests for dates are being received from exhibitors all over the State, and from all indications it will be several weeks before a return engagement in San Francisco can be secured.

In order that they may change their pictures every day, the management of the Powell Street Edison theater began Monday, Sept. 30th, taking Universal service from the California Film Exchange. This house has practically no transient patrons, so did not receive the attendence it should on days following change days. Hence the switch from licensed to independent.

The moving picture men of the State of California are puzzled regarding the present status of the Mutual Film Corporation in regard to the distribution of its product in California. Just at present the situation is extremely hazy or rather tangled. As reported several weeks ago, one of the local Independent exchanges secured the output of the Mutual and has since been booking same. This week letters were received from another exchange by the exhibitors which stated this second exchange had secured the exclusive right to distribute the Mutual releases in this State. Then a third local Independent exchange makes the assertion that they, too, are in a position to book the several brands produced by the Mutual. By next week all this will likely be straightened out and the Independent exhibitors will know just where they are at. It really is an important matter to them as the Mutual program is an acknowledgedly excellent one.

The Heidelburg theater, Oakland; C. A. Douglass, Merced; Green's theater, San Bruno, and Geo. J. Roy, at Burlingame, have each installed in their houses within the past week one or more Power's 6A machines, supplied by the Golden Gate Film Exchange.

Mr. F. K. Ricksecker left this city on Sept. 25th for an extended trip through the East in the interests of the Photo Player Company, of which concern he is the vice-president. He started off with a railway ticket several feet in length, a suit case full of data regarding their instrument and a supply of unbounded enthusiasm. He expects it will require three or more months' time to exhaust that trio "stock in trade," and that in the meantime he will visit several thousand of the many motion picture theaters which abound in the country.

The Board of Health of San Francisco has offered to co-operate with the Moving Picture Exhibitors League to eliminate unsanitary conditions in the motion picture theaters, their especial attention to be directed toward the absolute discontinuance of the habitual nuisance of spitting on the floor in such places of amusement. A slide will be made up and distributed among all theaters, which, will call the attention of the patrons to the law prohibiting such filthy habits. It is expected a clause will also be incorporated requesting (or demanding) that "no dogs be brought into this theater." If that last section is enforced it will be a great aid to the manager who is really trying to keep his house clean, as the present dog patronage of several San Francisco motion picture theaters is entirely too great for the comfort of the human patrons.

Kohler & Chase announce that they are taking careful measurements of the manual-controlled instrument they are now building for a prominent local motion picture theater, and will send complete drawings and general data to the home office of the Rudolph Wurlitzer Company so that the factory will be enabled to duplicate this magnificent double-tracker instrument in their main factory. The initial organ of this type will be finished within the next couple of weeks, when engraved invitations will be mailed to all interested by the manager of that department, Mr. deAvenough, who will officiate at the opening performance.

"ANDY."

OREGON.

THE Globe Theater, one of the handsomest and most up-to-date photoplay houses, was opened for the first time in Portland on Saturday evening, September 14th. A great crowd had gathered before the hour announced for the opening and it was with some difficulty that the aisles and passage ways were kept clear with such an on-rush of people eager to be on hand at the opening. Many beautiful floral pieces denoting the wishes of success, amongst them being a "floral globe" to represent the theater, were given the management. I. Lesser Cohen, manager and secretary of the Globe Theater Company announced that the purpose of the company in erecting the house was not only to offer to the Portland people the most beautiful theater in the country, but to meet the very highest requirements of this attractive form of moving picture entertainment and education. Special attention is to be given to films of an educational value, historical, geographical, scientific and industrial. The music to the patrons that is to be offered at this theater will be of pronounced merit. The company has installed an organ of exceptional quality, costing about $7,000, which was manufactured especially to its order and carefully adapted to the acoustic properties of the house. This organ was in course of construction for six months, and is remarkable in many of its characteristics. There is probably no instrument to equal it in any public entertainment house on the Coast. It is supplemented by an echo organ and chimes, and lovers of high-class music can be always certain of gratification. The building is absolutely fireproof, the seats and aisles commodious, plenty of exits and built to a style that is pleasing in architectural work. First-run licensed films will be shown. A. L. Levy is the president of the company.

The quickest piece of work ever gotten out in the film line was that of the Peoples Amusement Co.'s cameraman, who had taken the pictures of Theodore Roosevelt who arrived in Portland at 12 noon, one day, and whirled around the city until 2 o'clock. Over 307 feet were taken and at 5 o'clock that same evening they were exhibited at the company's Arcade Theater.

The General Passenger Agent of the Oregon Electric Railway Company, has invited the Peoples Amusement Company to participate in the dedication of their electric line from Portland to Eugene, some 123 miles south. The Peoples' cameraman will take a reel of pictures of this historical event, which will be made with impressive ceremonies.

One thousand feet of the salmon industry were taken by the cameraman of the Peoples Amusement Co. at Astoria, Oregon. This is one of the best educational pictures yet taken on the Coast that will soon be booked throughout the country with the Independent exchanges.

The Oregon Motion Picture Company has contracted to take the Pendleton Round-Up pictures at the annual round-up to be held in Pendleton soon. Ten thousand feet of film wil be used and 4,000 feet of the best will be clipped to be cold on the states right plan.

G. A. Metzger, general manager of the Oregon Independent Film Exchange, has just returned from a trip through Southern Oregon, where he has acquired some new business.

Melvin G. Winstock, of the proposed new film company, has purchased thirty-two acres at Beaverton, Oreg., where he intends to make the home of the company and plant a studio. The price paid is $500 per acre or $150,000 for the entire tract. The scenery is such that cannot be beat anywhere along the coast. It has hills and several streams running through the tract, timber that is several hundred feet tall, and brush is plenty throughout the tract for the production of Wild West pictures. Paraphernalia is being bought daily for the new studio.

The People's Amusement Company has approved the plans for building a photoplay house 50 x 100 at Corvallis, Oreg.

Melvin G. Winstock, general manager of the People's Amusement Company, left for Pendleton, Oreg., September 27th, to witness the "Round-Up," and while there concluded arrangements for the building of a theater in that city.

The Star Theater in Portland is being redecorated throughout. Mr. Arthur Philips is the new manager.

At the Rotary Club's weekly luncheon M. G. Winstock was chairman of the day and spoke on the subject of "Motion Pictures and their Making;" also dwelling upon the history and educational knowledge that can be derived from the films that are exhibited in the different theaters. Hon. A. Burnstine also spoke upon the subject of the art of making pictures. Covers were laid for 200. A special exhibition for the benefit of the Rotary Club members was given of Blanche Walsh in "Resurrection."

E. N. WEINBAUM.

GRAND RAPIDS.

PERHAPS the busiest man in the city to-day is Mr. J. M. Breen, the genial general manager of the United Theaters Company. Mr. Breen has been in the moving picture game since its inception in Grand Rapids, and his duties as manager of the large number of United Theaters, including the Monroe, Idle Hour, Original, Idea and Orpheum, with the getting out of the various programs, payrolls, looking after the employment of help, etc., all make a position which means being on the job a good many hours a day. Mr. Breen has certainly made good as evinced by the largely increased patronage of the various houses under his general managership, and he surely deserves all that is coming to him in the way of good luck.

Mr. B. S. Davis, manager of the Lyric Theater, is running a dandy universal program furnished by the Anti-Film Company, of 128 Lake Street, Chicago. His house is always well filled and though he has discontinued the use of souvenirs at matinees, the business steps along in the same old lively fashion.

Mr. Henri Kellar, formerly a favorite member of the Bishop Stock Company, is now door man at the Idle Hour. He has many friends in the city and his smile has a magnetism that is all its own.

Mr. F. J. O'Donnell, manager of the Orpheum and Columbia Theaters, reports a fine business. The recent improvements at the Columbia are fine and dandy, the new lighting system being highly spoken of. Many night crowds have been turned away from the Columbia. The Orpheum offers excellent 10c vaudeville and 30,000 feet of film: business could not be better.

The Lyric Theater of Grand Rapids is always on the lookout for big features. No features are too big to handle and it will pay the feature folks to "get in tuch" with Mr. Davis, the manager.

Mr. C. N. Williams is now in charge of affairs at the Monroe-Vaudette. He has taken charge since Mr. B. S. Deazey went to the Orpheum as house manager. Mr. Williams has a long experience and knows his work thoroughly. Mr. Deazey has his hands full at the Orpheum, as it is doing a big business, and the vaudeville end is a departure from his old duties.

Mr. Masterman, who came from Boston to look after the affairs of the Original-Vaudette, is making a host of friends and the Original is pleasing the crowds.

The Pathe feature, entitled, "Blighted Son," was shown at the Idle Hour recently. The house opened early and at 10 o'clock in the morning was turning away the crowds. The crowds kept up all day and the film proved a huge success. Owing to booking arrangements, the Original can show the features only one day, which is unfortunate, as they could often be given several days to good advantage.

Extensive improvements are being contemplated at the Superba. There will be a spacious balcony added and the theater will re re-decorated. Nichols Bros., who operate the Apollo and the Superba, as well as a theater in Flint, are optimistic concerning the outlook for the immediate future. They are featuring as many feature films as possible and have made a specialty of good music with the best results.

The Cines picture, "Daughter of the Spy," showed to well crowded houses at the Original Vaudette. It was well advertised.

A nice business is reported at the Freeport, Ill., Superba Theater, which is controlled by Nichols Bros., of this city. The Superba is under the able management of Mr. Martin Wagner. It seats 300.

Mr. A. J. Gillingham comes to Grand Rapids frequently, from Detroit, where he has very large motion picture interests, to look over his local propositions in the United Theaters. Gillingham & Smith dominate the licensed field here and are handling their theaters in a manner which makes them more popular every day.

Work is going on in the building occupied by the Superba, under the management of Geo. C. Nichols. The building is owned by the Superba Amusement Co., Inc., Geo. C. Nichols, president and general manager; F. D. Nichols, secretary and treasurer. The entire two stories will be made into a theater with balcony. The seating capacity will be 550 and high grade vaudeville will be run in addition to pictures. The front will be a very attractive one, of staff and brick with splendid illuminating effects. The entrance will be of marble and the seats all upholstered. The film service at the Superba is the Universal, furnished by Universal Exchange, Detroit, Mich. A Power's No. 6 projection machine is used.

Mr. Frank J. O'Donnell, manager of the Columbia, intends to maintain the high standard set for that house, as evidenced by his action the first week of this month in promptly canceling two acts which did not come up to the standard. Mr. O'Donnell is on the job every minute and his work is showing big results.

Emmet Poland, manager of the Superba, at Flint, Mich., reports business as exceptionally good. Vaudeville is given and the admission price is ten cents. Capacity of house is 400 and it is also controlled by the Superba Amusement Co., of Grand Rapids.

The Lyric of Grand Rapids is featuring Independent films and Mr. Davis, the manager, has a big business, capacity houses at night performances being the regular rule. The house is being thoroughly re-decorated.

HUGH KING HARRIS.

PHILADELPHIA.

THE Bijou Dream theatre, No. 1205 Market street, under the management of Frank Buhler, is undergoing a course of alterations. A new solid plate glass front has made the outside very attractive, and with new seats and the inside newly frescoed, the theatre now is one of the finest in the city.

Announcement has just been made of the proposed erection of two more theatres in West Philadelphia. Recently the West End Realty Company took title to the property at 23 to 37 North Fifty-second street, which will be the site of one of the theatres, costing $75,000. The other theatre will be built at Sixty-first street and Woodland avenue.

Moving picture houses having vaudeville features must pay a State Tax license of $500 a year, in addition to taking out a city license, according to a decision of the Supreme Court. The court refused the petition for an appeal from the decision of the Superior Court, which held that such houses come within the provision of an act of the legislature, fixing the annual tax of $500 on places of amusement that had "theatrical" and operatic entertainments.

To insure the rigid enforcement of the recent act of Congress prohibiting the importation of moving picture films of prize fights. The Secretary of the Treasury in a letter instructed Collector of Customs Hill to see that a most careful examination of films be made by the inspectors. All inspectors have been requested to make affidavits declaring to their best knowledge and belief whether films inspected by them are those of prize fights.

Vice-President Arch Johnston of the Bethlehem Steel Company is now in South American countries with several thousand feet of moving picture film showing the different departments of their plant, which is to prove to the high officials of those countries the vast facilities that his company has for the manufacturing of weapons of war.

George H. Chapman will erect a one-story moving picture theatre, 44.9 by 85 feet on the south side of Orthodox street, west of Paul street, Frankford, at a cost of $5000.

Boyertown, Pa. is to have an up-to-date theatre building, which will be owned by the Lyric Amusement Company, of which William J. Schaeffer, of Boyertown is manager. The new theatre is to be a building of the most approved type and work on its construction will be started soon.

Suit has been started by Nathan Appell, of Reading, pa., through Counsel Dunn & Schaeffer, against Solomon K. Cohn, Harry J. Luken, Jacob G. Wolf and Cornelius G. Keeney for the recovery of $2,780 alleged due rent of the Grand Opera House from September 14, 1911 to June 30, 1912. The lease called for an annual rental of $3,500.

Charles Redfern, thirty-five years old, of No. 5647 Appletree street, was arraigned before Magistrate Harris recently, on the charge of taking $55 from his former employer, Frank Haley and was held under $500 bail for court. Redfern was arrested in a moving picture house where he was employed as a piano player.

The foundation for the new theatre building now being erected at Harrisburg is about completed, and the work on the upper portions of the place will be pushed to the limit so as to give the people of that city another amusement place for the fall season.

The Eclair Film Company, had a cameraman in Altoona, Pa., making pictures of the celebration which has just ended in that city. The events will be exhibited all over the country.

Samuel Germanski, proprietor of moving picture shows in Bridesburg and Manayunk, was convicted in Quarter Sessions Court yesterday of operating an illegal lottery. Judge Martin allowed the defendant to enter $600 bail pending disposition of a motion for a new trial. Germanski's scheme was to give out prize checks with admission tickets, entitling the bearer to a chance on a lot at Pine Beach, N. J. Witnesses to the number of a dozen said that they had been notified that they each won a prize lot and they paid Germanski $7.50 as expenses for conveyancing. According to the witnesses they have been unable to locate their newly-acquired properties.

What the manufacturers claim is the largest piece of plate glass in the State is being installed at the Empire Moving Picture Theatre in Reading, Pa., to be used as a screen. The dimensions are 12½ feet by 16 feet eight inches. The glass is more than two and a half inches thick. Its weight is 3,500 pounds, and its cost, including installation, is $1,000. The Motion Picture Screen Company of Shelbyville, Ind., is very much pleased with the glass.

E. Allen Wilson is making plans for a theatre to be used for motion pictures and vaudeville for McCartney & Redmond, which will be located at Richmond and Clearfield streets, and will cover an area of 72 feet by 190 feet.

CLEMENT H. CONGDON

INDIANAPOLIS.

UDGE REMSTER, of the circuit court has overruled a demurrer to the affidavit filed against J. M. Rhodes, owner of a moving picture theater, charging that he violated the ordinance prohibiting any child under fourteen years old from attending a moving picture theater unless accompanied by a parent or guardian, or by an adult having written consent for the child's attendance. The case is on appeal from police court, where the ordinance was held invalid, the city taking an appeal to the higher court. Judge Remster's decision, in effect, holds the ordinance valid, but the case will be tried on its merits.

The new Lyric Theater in North Illinois Street was opened October 15. It has been built by B. B. Barton and Charles Olsen, pioneers in the moving picture theater business in this city. The theater building is 150 feet by 200 feet, built of fireproof brick and will have a seating capacity of 1400. The lobby is being finished in marble and the furnishings, although elaborate, will be in excellent taste. Girls in uniform will serve as ushers and there will be maids in attendance in the women's checkroom. Moving pictures, with a few vaudeville attractions will be given. Barton and Olsen also conduct the Crystal moving picture theater and expect to open another house in Illinois street within a few weeks.

A new moving picture theater is being built by the Hamilton Amusement Company at 2116 East Tenth street, in the residence district. It will be a one story, concrete block structure, 40 feet by 75 feet, with a stone front. There will be a seating capacity of six hundred. The company was recently incorporated with an authorized capitalization of $10,000, and those interested in it are W. A. Denoe, formerly interested in moving picture theaters in eastern cities; W. C. Allen and Charles A. Allen.

Moving picture theater managers of the city are preparing to go to the state legislature next January and ask a repeal of the law forbidding theatrical or other similar amusements on Sunday. An attack is also being made in the local courts against an ordinance forbidding theatrical performances on Sunday. All of the theaters and moving picture theaters of the city are behind the movement.

Indianapolis local No. 1 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League, has opened headquarters at 410 Saks Building. There are thirty-two moving picture theaters represented in the local. All amateurs appearing in the motion picture houses, are being booked through the local's office.

Harry D. Tutewiler, city playground commissioner, has had films made showing the city playgrounds and bathing beaches during the last summer. These films were exhibited at the fifteenth International Congress of Hygiene and Dermography held in Washington, D. C., in September, and at the fourth National Conservation Congress held in Indianapolis Oct. 1-4.

There has been installed in the new Alhambra theater, the largest pipe organ ever placed in any motion picture theater in America. The organ and all of its accessories, occupies more than 1000 square feet of space. The organ is of the two manual type, has thirty-seven registers and in all 72 accessories. An echo organ with cathedral chimes has been placed in a loft in the front of the theater. The theater contains two new Power's projection machines.

Moving pictures have been adopted in connection with the high school work at Anderson, by the board of school commissioners of that city. Motion pictures are to be used in illustrating history and other subjects.

H. P. Wysor, B. H. Whitely and C. R. Andrews have organized the Home Motion Picture Company at Muncie, to conduct motion picture theaters. The company has been incorporated with an authorized capitalization of $30,000.

Daniel P. Roberts, who has conducted motion picture theaters in this city for some time, has organized the Iroquois Amusement Company, which has been incorporated with an authorized capitalization of $50,000. Others interested in the company, which will operate several motion picture houses, are John Wohner and Jessie Wohner.

C. L. CUMMINS.

IN THE NORTHWEST.

THE Minneapolis Public Schools will use moving pictures this year in teaching history and geography. More than half of the schools in the city now have their own stereopticon machines, and with a circulating library of slides, but it is planned to improve the service. Phonographs are to be installed as well.

Moving pictures of the children of President Taft, watching the dances of the Blackfoot Indians, at Glacier Park, were recently made.

The Rivers-Wolgast fight pictures were stopped at the Star Theater, St. Paul, by the United States District Attorney.

BING!

WE'VE REACHED OUR AIM!

SHOT FULL OF ENTHUSIASM!

It was INEVITABLE. It was as certain as MERIT itself! It was bound to be --- and it happened! Prosperity doesn't need advertising --- Success doesn't need a Press Agent.

SARAH BERNHARDT IS TOURING THE COUNTRY IN THE GREATEST PHOTOPLAY EVER PRODUCED.

Exhibitors of "QUEEN ELIZABETH" are floating to Prosperity on a Wave of Enthusiasm!

IT ALL HAPPENED IN ONE EVENTFUL WEEK:

Messrs. Josiah Pearce & Sons, 814 Canal St., New Orleans, La., purchased the State Rights for TEXAS, LOUISIANA, MISSISSIPPI, ALABAMA, TENNESSE, KENTUCKY, GEORGIA and FLORIDA.

The Famous Players Film Co., of Kansas City, Mo., has arranged to book the theatres in ARIZONA, MONTANA, WYOMIMG, MINNESOTA, NEVADA, OREGON, N. DAKOTA, S. DAKOTA, UTAH, IDAHO, N. MEXICO and WASHINGTON.

The Kansas City Feature Film Co., 813 Walnut St., Kansas City, Mo., has joined the prosperity line and are booking ARKANSAS, NEBRASKA, MISSOURI, OKLAHOMA, IOWA and KANSAS.

The Famous Players Film Co., Grand Opera House Bldg., Atlanta, Ga., will heed the clamoring demands of exhibitors in N. CAROLINA, S. CAROLINA, VIRGINIA and W. VIRGINIA.

The eight thousand nine hundred plus exhibitors who have repeatedly requested the information respecting booking for "QUEEN ELIZABETH" need only get in touch with the concerns mentioned above to book the film in the various territories—but they need do that NOW—IMMEDIATELY, IF NOT SOONER.

Francis has never done a better thing in all his splendid career. Miss Tennant stands forth in eminent fashion and Robert Frazer is huge in his success. The story has real red blood to pump into the hearts of its characters. It rings true from the silence of Jim to the completion of the wonderful tale he tells. Just the sort of story which could never happen anywhere else but in that wild, lonesome, Canadian North-West. The Exhibitor who does not or can not show it is the loser. REMOVING SUNKEN VESSELS (Oct. 16).—Who is aware that the New England Coast is the graveyard of many ships, which are not only a menace to navigation, but which contain much that is worth saving? Wrecking companies are organized for the purpose of buying up these vessels, sending divers down to get exact locations, blasting when necessary, and finally bringing up fantastic shapes, covered with barnacles and sea-weed. And yet from all this comes much that is valuable. Copper, wood and other material have a commercial value after their long soaking, which is considerable.

LIKE KNIGHTS OF OLD (Oct. 16).—A young girl, whose time is spent in reading historical novels, has an ancestor whose life-sized portrait hangs in her library. He is her ideal type of man and she has no use for modern young men. Fred Norton, a young stock broker, is in love with her, but she holds his manner of living in scorn, telling him to emulate the heroes of the Sixteenth Century. She falls asleep and we see the life-sized portrait of her ancestor become animated and her ideal steps from the frame and approaches her in a most gallant manner. The scene now changes, disclosing her dream of the Sixteenth Century and the life led by women of that period. The commands of her lord and master are unreasonable in the extreme, and for disobeying him he strangles her almost to death. When the exciting scene reaches its highest pitch she suddenly awakens, to find it was but a dream. Although it was only a dream, it makes a profound impression on her, so much so that when Fred calls again he finds her views concerning the Knights of Old quite changed and a modern man is preferable to her after all.

THE FOUNDLING (Oct. 18).—We are introduced to a young man, Frank, who is supposed to be the son of a celebrated artist. Frank and another young man are rivals for the presidency of a well-known club. Shortly before the election the rival discovers that Frank is not really the artist's son. He causes this information to be published in a newspaper, and upon being confronted with it, the artist is forced to admit the truth. He took Frank when a small boy from the Old Foundlings and brought him up as his own son. With Frank the artist visits the foundlings and there finds, as the only clue to the former's parentage, a very curious drawing of a chicken sitting on a large weight, with a hammer on one side and a pair of shears on the other. From this the artist is able to guess the place of his birth, and even the suggestion of his name. Following up the clue Frank visits the town of Dorking, where he meets the vicar's charming daughter. Her interest is immediately enlisted. The first name they find leads them the wrong way, and this fact is taken advantage of by the rival, who, by bribery, makes it appear that the village toper is Frank's father. However, the real facts, which show him to be the son of a worthy couple whose marriage was kept a secret, are disclosed just in time and we know that he will not only get the club's presidency, but the more valuable prize of the vicar's daughter.

A SOLDIER'S DUTY (Oct. 19).—The Lieutenant John Miller, U. S. A., receives a note from his Southern sweetheart chiding him for not getting through the enemy's lines to visit her. His pride determines him, and going to his general he asked leave of absence. The general tells Miller that leave of absence will be given him on condition that he purposely gets captured in his fiancée's home with a decoy despatch on him. Miller refuses, then the general reminds him that his first duty is to the flag. His patriotic appeal decides Miller and he consents.

How Miller by a trick gets through the enemy's lines and arrives at his sweetheart's house; how he is tempted; how, by a superhuman effort, he masters himself and sends crashing to the floor a large marble bust which causes his capture; how the decoy note works and the enemy is utterly routed; how the remnant return to avenge themselves on Miller, and are only prevented from shooting him by the strategy of Grace; all these scenes must be witnessed to be appreciated.

The closing scene, five years later, is something to be remembered. Picture in your mind a stately colonial mansion, now utterly ruined. Grace's father slumbers by the door. To this scene returns Jack Miller, and he is confronted by Grace, who tells him that however much she may have loved him, she can never forget the suffering he has brought on her and hers.

Jack turns to go. He is recalled by Grace's father, who tells him that after all he did his duty as a soldier and the lovers are reunited.

KITTY AT BOARDING SCHOOL (Oct. 21).—In this film story you will find an idyll of school days. Kitty is a popular girl and when some of the boys from the university across the way happen (?) along where the girls are having a little picnic all alone, she is the center of attraction. Naturally the other girls are jealous and they give Kitty the laugh when the chaperon admonishes her for her actions. When they get back to the boarding school Kitty is a little snubbed by the rest of the girls. They go for their fun without her and she is left severely alone. While sitting musing, a half-witted fellow, who delivered for the tailor to the boys' university, made the mistake to come to the girls' school with one of the boy's suits. Kitty kept the clothes and moreover, put them on. The consequences were rather beyond what she foresaw.

MOTHER GOOSE IN A 16TH CENTURY THEATER (Oct. 21).—In this film we see Mother Goose catering to the joy and happiness of young folks as well as old. She gives us a real taste of what things were in the past when good Queen Bess ruled and Mr. William Shakespeare was the power in the theatrical way. He had no scenery in his day and when they wanted to change a set for the next act a stage hand brought out a placard bearing the legend, "paddock" for a stable yard and, when the same scene was to be changed to a banquet hall they would simply change the card to one bearing the words "banquet hall."

Charley goes to the baker's shop and steals a bag of barley and as he comes out he is surprised by the baker and gets that famous clout that makes him hop, hop, hop. Little Jack Horner sits in his corner and we see him do that which made him famous and all to the delectation of the little audience that sits on the stage just as they did in William Shakespeare's time.

The Queen of Hearts makes some tarts and the King gives the Knave a fearful beating and the tarts are restored, much to the Queen's happiness.

And little Miss Muffit sits on the tuffet and a terrible big spider comes and places himself beside her and Miss Muffit gets an awful fright and scampers away to safety.

AT THE MASQUERADE BALL (Oct. 22).—Margaret's salary as a stenographer gave her little leeway for pleasure. She knew of society events only from her morning paper, and when she read of the grand masquerade Mrs. Van Rensellaer was to give she fervently wished that she could go, and when she saw handsome Jack Van Rensellaer at her employer's office she wanted to go more than ever. Jack, too, was interested; he called more than once at the office, ostensibly to see his friend, but in reality to see the little stenographer, whose modest demeanor appealed to him.

Miss Winslow, one of the invited guests, lost her invitation and Margaret found it. Here was her chance! After what seemed an age to Margaret, the night of the ball came. Her invitation passed her by the butler without question.

Jack Van Rensellaer, dressed as Romeo, recognized her. In the conservatory he laughingly proclaimed her as his Juliette. Later, as they danced together, Miss Winslow, who had made herself known to her hostess, after explaining the loss of the invitation, lost a valuable jewel in the ball-room.

The hostess explained the loss to all and requested that her guests unmask. Poor little Margaret! Her only escape lay in Jack's help. She quickly begged him to take her to the conservatory where she could explain. She told him of finding the lost invitation and her desire to have one gala night to relieve the monotony of her hum-drum life at the office. Then she lifted her mask for Jack. He believed her and would see her through, and soon the occasion came, for Miss Winslow, in her search for the jewel, came upon them and immediately went to tell Mrs. Van Rensellaer of the one masked guest, but meanwhile the jewel was found upon the ball-room floor. Apologies were made and Jack's indulgent mother was satisfied to accept Margaret upon her son's acknowledgment of his friendship for her.

AT HOME IN THE WATER (Oct. 23).—Here we have a demonstration by one of the world's greatest exponents of swimming, M. G. H. Corsan. And this demonstration is not in the confines of a tank, but on the shore of Lake George. Mr. Corsan shows us the most approved methods of life-saving, and after marveling at his own work, we are left to admire some of the feats of two of his most advanced pupils—a young man and a girl. How these two paddle safely off in an apparently submerged canoe is a sight worth going a long way to see.

THE BOY RANGERS (Oct. 23).—A dozen young Americans all go camping, for it is summer. They call themselves "The Boy Rangers." They happen to pitch their tents near an eccentric farmer's estate. He has been bothered with tramps to such an extent that he has posted a notice to the effect that he will pay a reward for the capture of anyone trespassing on his grounds.

The boys see the notice and the peculiar actions of the owner of the property cause them to think he is a tramp. The detective department gets to work. The boys are as earnest as the great Gaboriau, and to their chagrin they soon find that they have arrested a man for stealing his own fishing pole. As they go up the road with their quarry, a country constable identifies their prisoner and the boys try to quietly sneak away. The constable and the property owner soon appreciate the joke and the boys are called back. They receive a reward for their diligence and they leave delighted.

What did they do with the reward? It is a laugh to see, for do not the spoils belong to the victor?

THE AFFAIR AT RAYNOR'S (Oct. 25).—When Mary walked into the office of Raynor & Jones she created what might be termed a magnetic disturbance. Raynor needed a stenographer very badly and welcomed Mary, while Wilson, Raynor's trusted clerk, instinctively disliked her.

Wilson had been losing steadily at the stock game until he was almost wiped out, and his last hope lay in somehow securing enough money to carry his margin. He knew that it was customary for the collector to allow himself half an hour to get to the bank, so, watching his chance, he steals over to the collector's coat and sets back his watch thirty minutes. As a consequence, the collector arrives at the bank after hours and is compelled to return with the money. Mr. Raynor is forced to put the money into the safe, and, watched by Wilson, he now proceeds to put the safe combination memorandum in his pocket, which hangs on the rack. Later, Wilson, in helping Raynor on with his coat, drops it. Wilson apologizes, takes the coat to the outer office to brush it and incidentally to steal the memorandum, which he hurriedly places behind the washstand. Later, after Mr. Raynor has gone and Mary is preparing to go home, she chances to see the stolen memorandum, and like a flash Wilson's intention dawns upon her. Quickly she makes another memorandum, and changing the figures, replaces. Wilson unsuspectingly gets the changed slip and asks Mary if she is going home. She makes an excuse about working late, and Wilson leaves. Mary now prepares for her vigil by procuring a revolver and switching off the lights. Hour after hour drags by and Mary begins to get weary. Suddenly she hears a key in the door and seeinw Wilson's shadow, starts up and darts behind the screen. Wilson stealthily enters and Mary, tensely grasping the revolver, breathlessly waits. Swiftly he gets to wark; back and forth the combination knob turns and now he tries the handle. Locked! Again and again he tries, the while feverishly consulting the false memorandum. He is beginning to despair. Suddenly he gets up and rushes into Raynor's private office. He must get that combination. This is Mary's opportunity. Stealthily she reaches the telephone and calls up Raynor's club. Explaining hurriedly the situation, she gets back behind the screen just in time to avoid Wilson, who rushes in like an infuriated beast. Again he tries the safe and again he is unsuccessful, and ripping out an oath, clinches his fists. This so startles Mary that she inadvertently makes a noise, which Wilson hears. Quickly turning, he rushes to the screen, only to find a revolver poked in his face. Nonplused for the moment, now he begins arduously to plead, but the revolver never wavers. Becoming frantic, he beseeches and implores. Mary feels that she cannot hold out much longer. She throws the screen toward Wilson and the fight is on. Suddenly the door is thrown open and Mr. Raynor, his brother and an officer rush in. Mary collapses—Wilson is arrested and the next morning Mr. Raynor's brother, whose admiration for Mary is unbounded because of her pluck the night before, succeeds in getting Mr. Raynor's consent to her going to Europe on a private diplomatic mission for him. (This is the fourth story on "What Happened to Mary.")

YOUNG MRS. EATON (Oct. 26).—The most pa'try of all reasons decides Mrs. Eaton. The stock market has been very unsettled of late and Eaton has neglected her shamefully. Could she not understand he was busy, very busy, playing the game. She was lonely and eventually found companionship in Mrs. Van Zandt, a veritable female Mephisto who inveigled the lamblike Mrs. Eaton into her clutches.

And now comes that part of the film which may be really termed "unique," a life-like reproduction of the "gambling houses" in society. One may see the very denomination of the cards and how Mrs. Eaton steadily lost until all her money was gone. And what then? The suave, purring, smiling Mrs. Van Zandt can always suggest some easy expediency.

"Why, of course, its very easy dear. Buy jewelry in your husband's name and pawn it."

Mrs. Eaton at first recoils at the suggestion but is finally persuaded. Once started, it becomes a fixed habit until one day Eaton, in need of ready money to carry on his transactions awakes to find himself accused of the promiscuous squandering of money. He is amazed when, on making application for a loan, he is refused. His credit is gone!

Now Mrs. Van Zandt discloses her real nature and when Mrs. Eaton cannot pay her I. O. U.'s she shows her a newspaper predicting her husband's bankruptcy. On Mrs. Eaton dawns the realization that she alone is responsible for her husband's ruin. Slowly she comes to a decision. She will go to her uncle who is the president of the bank that has refused to loan and intercede for her husband.

She is next seen entering the board room of the bank whose directors are in session and summoning all her strength, she discloses her responsibility for her husband's financial condition and makes a magnificent appeal for the continuance of his credit.

How she won the consent of the directors, particularly one who was reluctant is best appreciated by seeing the picture.

THE LAND BEYOND THE SUNSET (Oct. 28).—Little Joe's grandmother, a drunken old hag, beats and abuses him when he fails to bring her sufficient money with which to replenish her supply of liquor.

A settlement worker has given Joe a free ticket to a seaside excursion and picnic given by the Fresh Air Fund. What a day it was! Joe actually walked upon the grass without being driven off. He romped and played with the hundred other waifs until they were called to lunch. And then the fairy story—the first he had ever heard.

The soft voice of his pretty chaperon added greatly to the story and Joe's imagination began to work. But alas! The setting sun proclaimed it time to return to the city; the glorious day was at an end but not for little Joe. His chaperon had laid the book down at his very feet and now bustled about getting her charges ready for departure. Joe picked it up—the story all came back. He walked along the beach toward the setting sun. He found a boat without oars and not a soul in sight. A look at the book and the thought of his hovel called "home" helped him to make up his mind. His fairies had guided him to the shore and sent him a boat into which he climbed; he needed no oars because his fairy friends guided the boat and so he sailed out—out to sea, along the path of shining light to the land beyond the sunset.

BURMA, RANGOON, INDIA (Oct. 29).—In some scenes we are taken through an oriental market place congested here and there in the flurry of business activities while on either side of the streets, Burma flower girls line the way, peddling their goods and bargaining with the shrewdness of a prosperous merchant. Turning from here to the lumber region we see the tremendous strength of the elephant (a beast of burden) applying its bulk and brawn in moving such timber as would require mechanical force in a modern country.

BRINGING HOME THE PUP (Oct. 29.—Mr. and Mrs. Pipp and their small son Willie are spending their vacation in the country. Willie Pipp acquires a pup by trading his watch for it very much against the wishes of his disgruntled father who dislikes dogs, but Mrs. Pipp, who runs things, declares her baby boy shall have the pup at any cost and trouble begins to brew. The first real trouble begins when they miss their train to the city on account of the dog. This starts a quarrel which the angry Mr. Pipp seeks to terminate by throwing the pup into the river. Willie Pipp jumps in to rescue his pup. Old Pipp dives in to rescue his little Pipp and Mrs. Pipp screams for help. They are finally dried out and ready to start again for home. They succeed in bringing the dog to the city were more trouble awaits them. No dogs are allowed on the street cars and consequently they have to walk home. In trudging through the park they get into an argument with a policeman on account of the pup and finally, upon reaching home the janitor refuses to allow them to enter with the dog but Mrs. Pipp soon overrules his objections by crossing his palm with silver.

COPPER MINES AT BINGHAM, UTAH (Oct. 30).—You haven't seen the real West until you have visited Bingham, Utah, where the largest copper mine in the world is. Never been to the city of Bingham which has the proud distinction of being six miles long and sixty feet wide? Then just keep your eyes on the motion picture screen and see how they tear down the mountain and also tear it up, digging and blasting it and carrying it away in cars. Next to the Panama Canal this is the largest engineering operation in the world. Witness twenty-two railroad tracks, one above the other, view the aerial tram carrying hundreds of buckets of gold, silver and copper up over your heads.

Blast after blast rock the mountain at high noon. Men hurry for shelter when the shrill whistles send forth their warning from mountain peak to rocky pit. Huge steam shovels grasp gold and copper be-sprinkled Mother Earth within their iron jaws and lift her roughly into little cars which rush and rock around the mountain sides and then lay their precious burden down at the smoke dimmed, roaring furnace mouth. Night and day this gigantic toil goes on.

A SUFFRAGETTE IN SPITE OF HIMSELF (Oct. 30).—How a thoroughly respectable British householder, bitterly opposed to woman's suffrage, becomes apparently a violent advocate of the cause, the difficulties this gets him into finally leading to his arrest, his forcible rescue by a band of suffragettes who believe him their champion, his final arrival home in a torn and dilapidated condition before his astonished wife and, above all, how the fatal "votes for women" confronts him at the end—all these make the fun fast and furious.

SELIG.

A SAD DEVIL (Oct. 21).—Tom, Dick and Harry, a trio of college chums, spend their leisure time in framing up jokes upon each other. Dick and Tom have been reprimanded by the head of the institution for tardiness, so they buy an extra large alarm clock, in order to prevent and repetition of a trouble that may lead to their expulsion. In order to see them move three hours earlier than their scheduled time, Harry sets the alarm and lies abed, laughing as the other boys scramble into their clothes and rush hastily out into the wee hours of the morning to get breakfast that will not materialize for a long time.

They soon determine that Harry is the responsible party for their early discomfiture and retaliate by sending him a letter from his sweetheart, enclosing an invitation to a masquerade ball and instructing him to dress as Mephistopheles. Harry takes the invitation in earnest and at the chosen hour and place finds himself face to face with the president of the college who emphatically disapproves of his devil's disguise. He beats a hasty retreat and on his way back to his room has a series of desperate and embarrassing experiences.

SO-JUN-WAH AND THE TRIBAL LAW (Oct. 22).—Red Reagan, and two companions, Brooks and Mathis, lose their way while on a prospecting trip in the mountains. Fortunately they come to an Indian camp where they get food and water, and So-Jun-Wah a beauteous Indian maid, shows them the trail to the settlement. Reagan and So-Jun-Wah fall in love at sight, but he goes on his way. Later she meets him with her mother as they are out berrying. The old Indian woman covets two kettles hanging over their camp fire, but Reagan declines to sell them. The old squaw insists and pushes Jun-wah into the arms of Reagan, remarking, "You take girl, me take kettles." The mother takes the kettles and leaves her daughter with Reagan. The next day So-Jun-Wah returns to her home to get her pony and is returning to Reagan when Me-Ha-Jah a brave who has failed to win her love catches her, ties her to a tree and then rides on to the waiting Reagan and tells him that the Indian girl cares for him no longer. The revengeful Indian then returns to his captive and takes her to the chief of the tribe who condemns her to be stoned to death for having broken the tribal law. Reagan and his friends happen along and rescue the girl just as the cruel sentence is about to be executed.

TEMPTED BY NECESSITY (Oct. 23).—Jim Rogers, a clerk in a real estate office, has been sent to the bank to make the daily deposit. On his way he overhears a quarrel between a man and his wife and goes into their back yard to act as mediator. During his rather strenuous labor, he hangs his coat on the fence and Smooth Dan Tracy happens along, who abstracts the bank book and money. Rogers merely gets a beating for his interference and then finds he has lost the money. His employer promptly discharges him. His efforts to obtain work are unavailing and he is on the verge of starvation when Dan Tracy happens along and suggest that he assist him in wrecking the pay train. Rogers is so weak and hungry, that he assents to the scheme. The protestations of his wife against his associations with Tracy have so much weight that when that desperado attacks the station operator, Rogers interferes and again gets the worst of it, being knocked into a state of unconsciousness by the maddened Tracy. The latter gets the switch-key and rushes away to wreck the oncoming pay train. The faithful wife escapes from her room, rushes to the station, revives her husband and the operator and they all rush to the switch that has opened. They overpower Tracy and close the switch as the pay train thunders by to safety.

THE AWAKENING (Oct. 24).—Bill Williams, a poor inventor with a large family, suddenly comes into great wealth through the sale of an invention. Sudden affluence turns his head, and he changes at once from the plodding mechanic of the dingy shop into an ultra-fashionable man of the town. His wife, dazed with her new surroundings, stops at home ministering to her family as of old, while her husband soon finds congenial feminine companions, who flatter him into forgetfulness of his worthy but modest and retiring wife. Strangely enough Mrs. Coleman, the woman of fashion, takes a fancy to the neglected wife and persuades her to follow the example of her husband, in order to win him back. This eventually brings the husband to a sense of his obligations and he becomes reconciled to his wife.

THE FISHERBOY'S FAITH (Oct. 28).—Ferdinand loves Amanda of the island, but the offer of a well-to-do relation of hers to educate her, takes her to the main land. The new vistas of life enchant her, and her letters to him continue less frequent until they stop entirely. Ferdinand, reading glowing accounts of life in the navy, enlists in the service and Amanda, who has become engaged to a city man, visits her modest old home on the island. Ferdinand happens to pay one last visit to the island at the same time and saves from drowning the fiance of Amanda. When he learns of her engagement, he bids them both goodbye forever.

JIM'S VINDICATION (Oct. 29).—Many thrilling adventures of the wild West cling about the daring doings of the pony express riders, who cover the territory between the East and the West on horseback. One of these daring riders, exhausted after a long ride, is doped by a dose of morphine and robbed. A jury at trial convicts him of robbery and he is sentenced to serve time. His friends enable him to escape, having a number of faithful horses at command. During this wild flight for freedom, he encounters the real criminal and runs him down.

A HEART IN RAGS (Oct. 30).—A little girl playing hide and seek with her playmates near a railway switch, child-like climbs into a box car to hide. Before she is aware of it, the train pulls out and carries her away a helpless and unwilling prisoner. Her playmates report her loss and her agonized parents begin to hunt for the missing little one. In the interim, Pittsburgh Bill, a happy hobo, who is stealing a ride in the same car, discovers the little girl, Rosie, and proceeds to entertain her by playing hopscad and going through

Read what the MORNING TELEGRAPH of October 13th, 1912, says in an article entitled Films and Figures:

> * * * Extravagant prices are paid by these companies for special pictures. Recently $400,000 was offered to the VATICAN for the privilege of taking a picture of the POPE receiving visitors.* * *

So we announce the supreme accomplishment, the film scoop of picture history:

His Holiness Pope Pius X

And The Vatican

IT IS THE GREATEST MOTION PICTURE EVER OBTAINED, AND A FEAT WHICH WILL PROBABLY NEVER BE DUPLICATED

Every foot of it has been photographed by especial and exclusive permission. Every inch of it is absolutely GENUINE.

THE WILDEST OF COMMERCIAL DREAMS COULD NOT CONCEIVE A SUBJECT TO EVEN APPROACH IT IN BREADTH OF DRAWING POWER

BUYERS: Think not alone of the theatres, but of the churches, societies and halls. For its field is as broad as eye can see—its attendance possibilities are boundless. It is a miraculous triumph for all Filmland, and motion pictures are raised to the very sublime and become a sacred agent for all mankind. It is the first and most probably the last personal glimpse of the Pope ever to be given to worldly man.

THE SUBJECT EMBRACES THE FOLLOWING DIVINELY BEAUTIFUL, PROFOUNDLY REVERENT AND SOUL INSPIRING SCENES IN ENSEMBLE. ⁂ THE PERMIT FOR TAKING CINEMATOGRAPHS IN THE VATICAN. ⁂ FRONT VIEW OF THE CHURCH OF ST. PETER. ⁂ ON THE TERRACE. ⁂ LOOKING DOWN FROM THE TERRACE. ⁂ ST. PETER'S DOME. ⁂ PONTIFICAL GENDARME. ⁂ SWISS GUARD. ⁂ THE GARDENS OF THE VATICAN. ⁂ REPLICA OF THE GROTTO AND OF THE BASILICA OF LOURDES. ⁂ THE COURT OF THE PIGNA, ⁂ UPON WHICH OPEN THE WINDOWS OF THE POPE'S ROOM. ⁂ PINE CONE, ORIGINALLY MADE FOR THE CHATEAU OF ST. ANGE. ⁂ CASINO OF PAUL IV. ⁂ COMING TO A VERITABLE CLIMAX OF INFINITE INTEREST AS WE VIEW, ⁂ HIS HOLINESS POPE PIUS X.

The subject contains an almost equally wonderful filming of the last great a gathering of interest to all and of Important Interest to all of the Catholic Church

THE PICTURE WILL STIR THE CIVILIZED WORLD

Surrounded by every bit of necessary advertising, with exceptionally magnificent lithos in six, three and one sheets.

STATE RIGHTS BUYERS: This is, beyond peradventure of business doubt, the far greatest crowd-drawing subject ever offered in the history of cinematography. To neglect a single minute in securing business particulars is but to neglect your own profit. Every buyer in the whole of North America is going to spring into instant action on this subject.

To Wire is the quickest way. The man who best conceives the stupendous attendance this picture is going to attract is the man who will get it. He is the man who will not stand by and see a mint of profit fall into another's hands.

all sorts of foolish performances to allay her fears until he can put her off the train or restore her to her parents. When the train comes to a standstill the pair fall into a hobo camp and one of the disreputables attempts to steal Rosie from Bill and hold her for ransom. This starts a fight and results in the town constable and a posse raiding the camp. Finding Bill fleeing with the child in his arms, they assume he is a kidnapper and shoot him. He falls, fatally wounded by the railway track just as an auto bearing Rosie's parents comes upon the scene and she is restored to their arms. She is duly grateful and not forgetful and clears the faithful Bill of any stigma and he dies happy.

HER BITTER LESSON (Oct. 31).—Aurora Floyd elopes from boarding school with John Conyers, but hardly a week has elapsed before she discovers that she has married a worthless libertine. She appeals to her father for aid and advice and he finally pays Conyers to leave the country for a year, so that she can secure a divorce on the ground of desertion. She returns to her home town, and realizes that her girlhood sweetheart, John Mellish, is the man she really loves. Upon hearing the report of Conyers' death, she promises to become the wife of Mellish. Just as the marriage is about to be consummated, Conyers appears life-size and proceeds to blackmail her, until death relieves the earth of his presence.

HIS WEDDING EVE (Nov. 1).—Thomas Ellis, on the eve of his wedding, in a very nervous state is pacing the street two hours before the ceremony, when he bumps into a nurse girl carrying a child; the girl falling, sprains her ankle. The man finds he not only has a baby, but a girl on hand and relieves himself of the former by calling an ambulance. In his effort to dispose of the baby, however, he becomes an object of suspicion and is run into the police station. He is extricated from his dilemma after a most anxious hour, and arrives in church just in time to save his prospective bride from nervous prostration.

MELIES.

THE SMUGGLER'S PRISONER (Nov. 7).—Making an exceptionally good haul early in the morning, Jim and John, partners in a fishing smack, declare a holiday. Jims wife, Annie, prepares luncheon and, leaving the children in care of the obliging John, goes for a long promised row to sea with Jim. Returning that night the boat springs a leak, then sinks, and husband and wife are thrown into the water far from shore. Jim places the oars under his wife's arms for support and swims for help. Ann is washed ashore safe, though exhausted, and is revived by John, who, worried by their long absence, was at the shore searching for them with a sea glass. Jim is picked up by a smuggler's boat, and when well, is forced to become one of them. He attempts to escape when in port by instigating a mutiny, but is overpowered and threatened with death should he try it again. He is put under close surveillance. Five years have passed and Ann is still waiting and watching for Jim. Not once but many times, John, as Jim's best friend asks her hand in marriage, but she refuses. When the smugglers' vessel nears Jim's own port the temptation is too strong for him. He risks his life to jump overboard. On the shore are little Mary and Jim, Jr., his children, but they do not know him. They rescue him as he reaches shore exhausted and then call their mother. Ann recognizes him at once and the happy family are reunited once more after years of love and belief.

KALEM.

THE POWER OF A HYMN (Oct. 28).—The mother teaches the hymn to her sons, George and Tom, who are adopted by Judge Reynolds after the good woman's death. George proves a tractable and studious boy, but Tom is given to bad associates. One afternoon the judge finds him gambling with a number of boys of his own age, in a vacant lot. He takes the young boy home, talks to him and tries to influence him to keep away from evil companions. That night Tom runs away from home.

Twenty-five years roll by. George has never heard from Tom and is now a criminal court judge. Tom, on the downward path, is arrested for forgery and is held for trial before his brother. George, not knowing the forger is his brother, sentences him to prison.

Tom, after serving his time, swears vengeance against the judge. He learns of his home address and at night goes to the house with the intention of squaring his debt. Crawling through a window in search of his brother, he suddenly hears the tones of the hymn which he learned in his childhood. An inadvertent movement on the part of Tom draws the attention of George, who is seated at the piano. The judge takes a revolver from a nearby desk and starts after the intruder. Tom tells him who he is and the purpose of his visit. He explains that Providence has prevented him from becoming a murderer by permitting him to hear the hymn. The judge's three-year-old child, who has been a witness of the entire scene, leads the outcast to a chair. The judge places his hand on his shoulder and calls him brother.

THE STRANGE STORY OF ELSIE MASON (Oct. 30).—Little Elsie, scarcely two years of age, awakens one morning and crawls out of the house, dragging her doll. The little tot creeps to the nearby railroad station and resumes her nap in one of the flower beds.

Mrs. Hastings, a wealthy widow, is taking an early morning train, after having spent several weeks at an eastern summer resort. She reaches the station before train time and while strolling about, she discovers little Elsie. While she is fondling the little one, the train arrives and Mrs. Hastings, who has no child of her own, cannot master the temptation to take this baby with her.

Upon arriving in the west, Mrs. Hastings learns from a newspaper of the strange disappearance of Elsie Mason. Her first impulse is to communicate with the Masons, but she destroys her letter and preserves the news item.

Twenty years later we see that Elsie has grown to young womanhood and now bears the name of Christine Hastings. She leads a happy life with her foster mother, who all these years has kept her secret. During an afternoon tea, Mrs. Hastings' nephew, Jack, arrives on the scene and soon falls in love with the charming young woman.

Mrs. Hastings is taken seriously ill and her secret prays upon her mind. She calls Christine to her bedside and shows her the old news item. Soon afterward she dies and Christine, believing her place is with her parents, leaves a note for Jack and returns to her eastern home, where she takes up the simple life on the farm. But Jack cannot forget. When he finds the note he journeys to the east and gains Christine's promise.

PAT THE SOOTHSAYER (Nov. 1).—Pat, a knight of the hod, goes home to his faultfinding wife, with the usual results. It is pay day and Pat having spent a dime for refreshments, is severely taken to account by his helpmate. The row becomes so strenuous that Pat decides to leave his home forever. In a nearby rendezvous where he is accustomed to meet some old cronies, Pat learns of a fortune teller who needs an assistant. Our hero, believing he is particularly equipped for this line of business, makes application for the position and is engaged.

The next day Pat's wife reads the advertisement of the fortune teller and becomes convinced that no questions are too deep for Professor Bunko, and that he can solve the mystery of Pat's disappearance. Arriving at the fortune teller's, she is shown into a dimly lighted room and Pat, the assistant, is detailed to tell her fortune. This is the chance of a lifetime and Pat, embracing the opportunity, vividly describes his tragic death(?) and the conduct of the wife, which incited the unfortunate man's self destruction. Pat's wife, full of remorse, is about to become hysterical when she penetrates her husband's disguise. Then she has her inning and Pat is glad to return to the hod.

THE AMERICAN RHINE (Nov. 1).—By steamer we take a trip up the Hudson River, "The American Rhine." Grant's Tomb, Spuyten Duyvil, Indian Head, the highest point of the Palisades, Tarrytown Lighthouse, the stone house on Treason Hill where Major Andre and Benedict Arnold met, the walnut tree at Stony Point where Washington paid off his troops, Stony Point Hill, captured by "Mad" Anthony Wayne in 1778, Washington's sun dial at Newburg, New York, the Tower of Victory at Newburg, and the Otis Incline in the Catskill Mountains, are some of the many picturesque sights that meet our eye.

THE SKINFLINT (Nov. 2).—Tobias Imsier threatens to foreclose on the Widow Rix's note and carry off her cow. The widow resolves to appeal to her wealthy brother for assistance. Arriving at the home of the Skinflint, she makes known her plight, but her miserly brother tells her he is a poor man and cannot help her. The constable takes the widow's cow, but Osborn, the sweetheart of the widow's daughter, takes the money he has been saving up for his marriage and pays the note.

A few days later, while out riding, the horse driven by the Skinflint takes fright and runs away. When the wreckage is cleared the miser, bruised and unconscious, is discovered and the physicians' examination proves he has received a mortal injury. The skinflint is taken to his home, and his only near relative, his sister, is summoned to his death bed. As death draws near the old fellow realizes his many mean actions have brought him no happiness and his money cannot help him at this, his last hour. Calling his sister to the bedside, he begs her to forgive him and gives her the money he has accumulated.

ECLIPSE.

A RACE FOR HONOR (Oct. 30).—Charles Burgess, the proprietor of a large garage, receives a letter from a patron claiming to have left a purse containing $8,000 in one of the cars the evening before. The next day Mr. Gordon, the unfortunate customer, calls for his wallet, but the money cannot be found. Finger prints and the testimony of the watchman throw suspicion upon Frank, an engineer employed in the establishment, and matters look very grave for the young man, much to the grief of Lucy Burgess, who is secretly in love with him.

Suddenly she remembers that she saw her father enter the garage the night before and search several of the cars. Her suspicions are immediately aroused, much as she dislikes to direct them against her parent. Later, seeing her father ride out of the yard in great haste, she feels certain that he is seeking to escape justice. Without hesitation, the courageous girl quickly explains the situation to her sweetheart, and together they start in pursuit in another and swifter car.

The two cars race along at a tremendous speed for many miles, until finally, when the fugitive is obliged to stop for repairs, the pursuers easily overtake him.

Although furious at first, the older Burgess finally yields to his daughter's earnest pleading, and agrees to return the money, thereby saving them all from disgrace.

CINES.

MOSQUES AND TURKISH PALACES (Oct. 29).—Many beautiful edifices of the church and palatial homes of the rich in the cities of northern Africa are spread before us in an unusually attractive manner. We are shown in turn the "Palace of the Bey," the "Palace of the Padro," the "Lion's Staircase," the "Kuba," the "Mosque of Padro Bey" and several other interesting buildings. Close views of the mosaic walls and columns are indeed remarkable and cause us to marvel at the designs and workmanship of these master builders of the east.

STRAW HATS (Oct. 29).—An interesting subject showing the selection of straw, plaiting of the straw by hand or machine, drying the hats, shaping and ironing, and the last finishing touches to place them in readiness for the market. This is an industry of Florence, Italy.

VENETIAN LACE WORKERS (Oct. 29).—Every woman knows the beauty and value of hand-made Venetian lace, and will be delighted with this opportunity to witness the various processes of its manufacture. We are shown close views of the lace in actual making—every movement of the workers' hands can be followed in bringing the patterns to completion under their deft fingers.

A HEAD FOR A HEAD (Nov. 2).—Beatrice, the beautiful daughter of the rich Marquis Besier, is loved by Vigot, a humble gardener. She proudly repulses his attentions and later even advises her father to discharge the insolent fellow from the estate.

Filled with indignation, Vigot departs for Paris vowing vengeance against these aristocrats who despise him. Is he, a Democrat, not their equal? During the reign of terror Vigot becomes a close follower of Robespierre and the two are known as the Tiger and the Hyena.

The prosecution of the aristocrats is Vigot's opportunity. Informed of the Marquis' whereabouts he orders his arrest and condemnation. On the way to the guillotine in the fatal cart, the Marquis is recognized by Beatrice, his daughter. Her screams attract the notice of the crowd, who demand that she, an aristocrat, die also, and she is thrown into prison.

After pleading in vain in her behalf, Vigot finally determines to rescue Beatrice at any cost. By bribery he achieves his purpose, but Beatrice, although filled with gratitude, cannot love him, and the two part, never to meet again.

Her escape soon becomes known and Vigot, after a short trial, is condemned to die at the guillotine. Alas! he has sacrificed his life on the altar of love.

LUBIN.

AN IRISH GIRL'S LOVE (Oct. 28).—Kathleen loves Brian. Miles Rorke, a middle-aged farmer who is favored by Kathleen's stepmother on account of his prosperity, is another suitor. One night a neighbor, the widow O'Keefe, gives a dance at her cottage and Miles begs Kathleen to go with him. The stepmother urges and finally the girl consents. Brian appears at the dance and Kathleen favors him with the dances. The next day Miles goes to Kathleen's cottage and urges his suit. Brian, who is preparing for a voyage which will last for nearly a year, comes in. The question of Kathleen's hand is discussed, and she goes to her room, returning with two old rings. She gives one to each of the men and declares that she will in a year from that day marry the man who will first place it on her finger.

The year is almost passed and there is no news from Brian. Miles is making preparations for the wedding on the morrow. A fearful storm is raging on the coast and Kathleen goes to Miles's house and pleads that he shall give her until twelve noon before claiming her. On the fearful morning she goes down to the shore to search the wreckage. Two men watch her as she plunges into the sea and drag a body from the water. Thrusting her hand down the dead man's breast she finds the ring on a string around his neck. She bids the men to go and tell Miles that Brian has come back and the ring is on her finger.

PARSON JAMES (Oct. 29).—Richard James, better known among the boys of Barston as Parson James, was a minister of the gospel, but as his profession was not remunerative, he took up a claim on the mountain side that brought him a profitable sum. While working the claim Cummings, a gambler, and his wife, "Frisco Nell," were requested to leave town. Cummings was caught cheating at cards. "Frisco Nell" had a beautiful baby about a year old and fearing that a forced tramp over the mountains would kill the little one, she decided to leave it in the parson's care. When James returned after his day's work, he found the tot cuddled up on the sofa and a note told him that he had become a foster father. The boys of the camp were soon notified of the arrival of the parson's baby and each one wanted to contribute to the child's support, but the parson believed that he could take care of the child himself. When she grew older, she was sent to a convent and in a few years returned to the parson, a beautiful woman. Now that she had reached an age of understanding the parson told her of her father and his miserable life and how he had died. Also of her mother, who returned to see her child, but died in his arms before her wish could be granted. It all seemed like a strange dream to Nellie, as the parson was the only father she had ever known. Soon there came a letter to Parson James from an old friend, asking him to take charge of a new church many miles away. The friend suggested a match between little Nellie and his son, but she wanted no one but her "daddy." She now fully realized that she loved him with a deeper love than the love of a daughter. The parson told her that he could never part with his little girl after all those years of care, so they agreed that nothing would separate them as long as life lasts.

THE HEAVENLY VOICE (Oct. 31).—Mrs. Smith, a widow, and her daughter, Mary, live alone. The widow has an admirer in the person of Major Lee, a wealthy bachelor. He does not make much progress in his suit, however, until he discovers the widow's passionate love of music. One day while passing the village blacksmith shop, he hears the young blacksmith singing. The Major bribes him to serenade the widow every evening, after which the Major goes in and reaps the laurels. After this his progress is rapid. Mary discovers the deception, but does not betray the Major. She meets the musical blacksmith, however, and they fall in love. The conspiracy is almost successful, but disaster overtakes them on the night that the Major is to propose. He instructs John, the blacksmith, to be on hand promptly at eight that night, but John, in the company of his sweetheart, forgets, and is late. Meanwhile the Major has arrived, and after fuming awhile at John's delinquency, decides to trust to past performances and goes in to propose. John and Mary arrive immediately afterward and John, thinking he has beaten the Major after all, and expecting him any moment, begins to sing. The Major, however, is on his knees pouring out his love for the widow. He starts up in consternation and horror. The widow comprehends the deception, rushes out and captures John, who is innocently singing with Mary in his arms. She upbraids them all and breaks down and weeps. They soothe her and the Major explains that it was his great love for her which led to the deception. She finally becomes mollified, weeps on his shoulder, and everyone is happy.

FIXING A FLIRT (Nov. 1).—Bill Bruce is an imitation of "a man about town." He starts a flirtation with Bess Bradley, a stenographer, who has little use for a "make believe." He, however, invites her to dinner. Bess tells the head clerk, who outlines a scheme. The invitation is accepted and Bess and Bill are seated at a table in a rather pretentious cafe. Presently two other girls "blow in" and Bess greets them cordially. Of course, it is up to Bruce to ask them to sit down, which they do and commence to study the bill of fare. In a few minutes two more "drift in" and the other girls are delighted; the newcomers are invited by Bess to join the party. Before the orders are given three more turn up, and Bill finds that he has eight girls to feed. The dinner is most enjoyable until Bruce calls for the bill, which is much higher than his money roll will stand. He excuses himself for a few minutes and interviews the cashier, who will hear of no compromise except the money. Bill has to strip himself of his watch and other ornaments, and is carefully watched by the eight girls. Finally he makes his escape and upon reaching his home is tackled by his landlady, who talks money and nothing else. She is so hard-hearted that poor Bruce has to sleep on the doorsteps.

THE FAMILY NEXT DOOR (Nov. 2).—The Hoffman Bar is a notorious place mostly noted for the old referees, who settle disputes. Neighbors Ford and Heap have a dispute which is settled in favor of the former, much to the chagrin of the latter. Both exit swearing eternal war. Bob Ford is in love with Mary Heap and upon Heap's arrival home he discovers them kissing. He orders young Bob away from the premises. Bob returns home and tells his brother Roy his troubles. Roy tells him to go after the girl, never minding the old folks, and Bob decides to do so. Hop Heap locks his daughter Mary in her room. Bob gets some cow girls to assist him, and the girls hold up Hop Heap while Bob gets Mary to leave her room through a window and elope with him. Roy in the meantime has made up his mind to assist his brother. He starts out to do so. Meeting another bunch of girls and boys, he tells them his plans and asks if they will join him. They all agree to do so. Finally they catch up with Bob and the girls and start off for the parsonage. En route Bob and Mary send word to their respective fathers that they are going to get married. The fathers immediately start out in pursuit. Roy coming out of the church sees the fathers coming; he holds them up. The cowboys and cowgirls take the newly married couple to the station. The train is just pulling out. The friends returning get a glimpse of Roy and the neighbors going into the Hoffman Bar again. They follow them, and while inside the girls coddle the old men into signing a telegram recalling the children. All is forgiven.

NONE BUT THE BRAVE DESERVE THE FAIR (Oct. 28).—Mr. Hardy takes his daughter Flora and her beau, Jim, to see the circus when he gets an order to deliver milk. Professor Bluff, the elephant trainer, charms Flora by his pretended bravery. He becomes the idol of her dreams, and her love for Jim grows cold. A few days later Flora is in the barn collecting eggs, when she suddenly finds herself surrounded by four elephants who have escaped from the circus. She is at first alarmed, but the elephants are so friendly, she gradually learns that they are very docile and affectionate. Professor Bluff comes upon the scene. He tells her not to be afraid as he is their master! With an air of bravado, he drives them from the barn and poses as a hero. Flora sees through his false pretenses, and disgustedly expresses her opinion about "bunk" heroes in red coats and gold trimmings. The fallen hero can scarcely recover from his chagrin. When he does, he seeks a reconciliation with Flora. He finds her walking with her first and true love, Jim Hardy. The professor pleads with her, but the two lovers pay no heed to him.

BUNNY AT THE DERBY (Oct. 29).—In his little donkey cart, with his "Old Dutch," John Bunny, the costermonger, starts to the Derby, an annual national event in England. He is the observed of all observers and the envy of his neighbors when they cop the style in which he is doing things. As he proceeds along the post road to Sutton, and stops at the "Cock" Hotel, he is IT. From Sutton to Howell, and thence to the Spread Eagle, he's the whole cheese. As he makes the journey of the hill from Howell to the downs, it is a sight long to be remembered. There are finer equipages, but none more noticeable.

At the Derby he is the center of attraction and spends his money like a drunken sailor in treating his "loidy" to 'arf and 'arf and other refreshments. Topping off the expedition by having their fortunes told by one of the gypsies. Incidentally, Bunny has some very funny experiences, but he is a good sport, gets out of them gracefully, and quite satisfied with his day's outing. If you have ever attended the Derby, follow John Bunny in this picture and you will have the time of your life and see things that will surprise and amuse you.

JUST LUCK (Oct. 29).—Unemployed and despondent, Hank Fuller decides to invest his few remaining dollars in an Accident Insurance Policy, calculating to place himself in the way of danger in the hope of meeting with an accident and securing the weekly indemnity or the compensation for the loss of a limb or an eye. He lies down in front of a trolley car which stops within a few feet of him. He does the same thing in the path of an automobile, and it never touches him. He falls from the top of a house and lands in a load of hay. He explodes a stick of dynamite, with no injurious consequences. Disgusted, he goes to the insurance company and demands the return of his money, which is given. On his way down the steps of the building, he slips on a banana peel, falling down the full flight and rolling into the street with a broken leg and arm. In the hospital, reclining on his little cot, he sorrowfully exclaims, "Just my luck."

POET AND PEASANT (Oct. 30).—Louis La Salle, a young poet, tired of the dissipations of Paris, resolves to quit Paris for a summer holiday and go for a walking tour in Normandy. Mr. Savard lives on his small farm with his daughter Toinette. Baptiste, a deformed farmhand, worships Toinette from a distance, but never dreams she can return his affection. Louis meets Toinette, and asks where he can obtain a night's lodging. She invites him to her father's house. Toinette learns to love him, but no one sees the danger but Baptiste, who is powerless to interfere. For a while Toinette lives in a fool's paradise, then Louis is recalled to Paris and soon forgets her. She is broken-hearted and gradually fades away. On her death-bed she gives Baptiste a trinket Louis had given her, to give him if he ever returns. Two years pass, and Louis, with some friends, comes back to the village. He suddenly recalls Toinette and visits her old home to find it deserted. In the churchyard he meets Baptiste. The latter, first in a passion, seizes him by the throat, upbraiding him with his treachery to the dead. Then the memory of Toinette comes to him. He releases Louis, gives him the token and bids him go, and Louis, bowing his head in shame, leaves Baptiste alone with his dead love.

ON THE LINE OF PERIL (Oct. 31).—A young Northern soldier is chosen to find out, if possible, the plans of the Southern army. He goes to the Southern general's home. While hiding in the barn, he sees a Southern officer making advances to the General's pretty daughter. She repulses him and he attacks her. The young spy impetuously rushes to the girl's assistance. He knocks her assailant senseless. When she sees him in his Northern uniform, she accuses him of being a spy, but when she hears someone approaching, an uncontrollable feeling is awakened in her and she persuades him to hide himself in the loft of the barn. Her father and other soldiers appear and she tells them the spy has gone. Upon regaining consciousness, the officer who attacked the girl tells his men to make a thorough search of the barn for the spy. The girl, who has brought food to her protector, hears the men coming, drags him out of the barn into the house and hides him in the fireplace of the library, in which the General and his officers have left the maps and plans of their intended attack upon the Northern forces.

After the girl has left the room, he comes from his hiding-place, takes the plans and places them in the bosom of his shirt; stepping back into the fireplace again. The girl brings him a Confederate's uniform, which he dons and makes his escape.

After the war, when peace is declared, the Northern soldier goes South to visit the General's daughter and declare his love. She receives him with joy and tells him that her love has ever been his, but her father will never forgive him for what he did during the war. Her father, overhearing the conversation, and feeling that the young man had only done his duty and was brave enough to perform it, holds out his hands to the young man, which the latter grasps. Then the old General passes into the house, leaving the young people to themselves and the happiness of their re-union.

BETTINA'S SUBSTITUTE (Nov. 1).—Bettina was justified in being indignant because her employer, a married man, makes love to her. She tells her beau, Raymond, about it and he vows to get square with the old masher and teach him a lesson. He tells Bettina to send word to her boss that she is sick and obliged to remain at home for a few days, but she will send a substitute. Raymond makes up as a young woman and reports at Babb's office as Bettina's substitute.

The boss receives "her" very gracefully and very sweetly and kindly asks "her" to go to lunch with him. Raymond encourages him and later, at the office, in the presence of the boss's wife, he becomes so effusive in his familiarity with him Mrs. Babb tartly expresses her opinion.

The next morning Bettina and Billy go to the office and tell Mr. Babb they are engaged to be married. Bettina says she is glad that he liked her substitute. Raymond cannot restrain his laughter and says, "yes, you ought to see him make love to me!" Babb looks up in astonishment to see the young man place the wig he wore as Bettina's substitute on his head, thus revealing his identity and the joke played on him. Babb collapses and the young couple smilingly say, "Good morning."

LESSONS IN COURTSHIP (Nov. 1).—It is one thing to be in love and it is two things to be in love and too bashful to propose. This is Dick Warren's position. He confides in his friend, Billy Henson. "Leave it to me!" says Billy, "and after I have given you a few lessons in first aid to the lovesick and bashful, there will be nothing to it!" Billy arranges to dress himself in his sister's clothes and let Dick make love to him, coaching him in what he should do and say. They go to Billy's room and instructions begin. Dick is getting along famously, saying all sorts of sweet things to Billy; only calling him Alice, which is the name of the girl with whom he is in love.

In the midst of the performance, Billy's sister, with Alice, hide behind the portieres and overhear everything that is said. They are convulsed with laughter and pull down the portieres. Dick is so chagrined he can scarcely speak, but it is not necessary for him to say anything. What Alice has seen and heard has explained everything and the rest is easy for Dick.

IN THE GARDEN FAIR (Nov. 2).—The house next door to Mr. Cobb is rented by a widow named Mrs. Rose, who moves in with her little girl, Helen. Mr. Cobb is a widower with a little boy named Phil. Through the acquaintance of their two children, Mr. Cobb and Mrs. Rose are not very long strangers. Their neighborliness ripens into love and shortly they are engaged to be married. Unfortunately, an unforeseeen circumstance arises when Mrs. Rose accidentally discovers that Mr. Cobb very often admires the photograph which he has recently received of a very pretty lady.

They become estranged and she will not condescend to ask for an explanation. Cobb has about given up in despair. The children arrange to take an excursion on a lake some distance from their houses. Sometime after they have gone, Mrs. Rose cannot find her daughter, and Mr. Cobb goes in search of his son. They go together in search of the children. They find them in a boat on the lake. They have lost the oars and cannot get ashore. Mr. Cobb gallantly jumps in the water and goes out to the boat and pulls it ashore. Mrs. Rose is so delighted over the rescue of her daughter that she cannot thank Mr. Cobb too much and they become more friendly.

ESSANAY.

MISS SIMKINS' SUMMER BOARDER (Oct. 29).—Joe Mason, a bashful country boy, tries in vain to propose to Marian Foster, his sweetheart. But his bashfulness always always gets the best of him, and the proposal is just as far off as ever when Jack Richards, a brisk city chap, comes to board out the summer at the home of Miss Simkins, a spinster. In the course of his wandering around, Richards is introduced to Marian and immediately falls in love with her, much to Joe's discomfiture. Marian does not return Jack's love, but is fascinated by his dashing manner and carries on a mild

THE LION TAMER'S REVENGE

CINES, 2 REELS

A sensational story in which lions play an important part and cause many a thrill. Love, jealousy and revenge are, of course, the principal ingredients in this splendid drama, the closing scene being wonderful. A jealous lover, with the assistance of a clown—the play being enacted in a circus—lures his rival and his partner, the girl, into the den of lions, and binds them to a post. The woman manages to escape, later to accuse the murderer, but the lover is mangled to death by the infuriated lions.

OCTOBER 14, 1912 THE COUNT OF MONTE CRISTO THREE REELS

Adapted from Alexander Dumas' famous and romantic novel.

The wonderful and tragic story of Edmond Dantes, a young Frenchman, who is entrusted with a message to the exiled Napoleon on the Isle of Elba, forms one of the greatest themes ever written upon. The full reproduction of this masterpiece by Selig is unequalled by any stage production. There are over 300 people in the cast and shows the wonderful scene, gorgeous costumes and elaborate stage setting. This is one of the most fascinating pictures ever produced.

Features

Shakespeare's As You Like It

Vitagraph Release October 7, 1912. Three Reels.

Presented by the Vitagraph Company, with ROSE COGHLAN as Rosalind.

The Man Hunt

Pathe Release September 30, 1912. Two Reels.

Kilborne, a poacher, is loved by Rose, the daughter of an old charwoman, whose cabin in the midst of a dense forest is Kilborne's rendezvous. Although Rose has often saved Kilborne from the hand of the law, brutal treatment is her only reward, for Kilborne is in love with a farmer's daughter. He is being tracked by the gendarmes, and Rose, suspecting that he is at the farmer's house, hurries there to warn him of the impending danger. The police arrive at the farm immediately after her and surround the house. When Kilborne steps through the door he is ordered to surrender. He refuses. An officer raises his gun and fires. Rose steps in front of Kilborne as the shot rings out and receives the bullet in her heart. As she breathes her last Kilborne weeps for the first time in his life and realizes the depth of the love he never recognized.

Daughter of the Spy

Cines Release September 16, 1912. Two Reels

This is a story of a spy who gives shelter in his own home to a nobleman fleeing from the soldiers. The nobleman informs his host and his beautiful daughter of his identity and shortly after a file of soldiers enters the house and places him under arrest. Before going to prison, he denounces father and daughter for their duplicity. Heart-broken, at the fate of the nobleman, the daughter determines to make a desperate effort to release him. On a pretext she enters the prison and is shown about, noting carefully the location of the prisoner's cell. By a ruse, she procures the keys to the cell directly above that of the nobleman and with a crow-bar breaks a hole in the flooring, lowers a rope and helps the prisoner to liberty. The two make a perilous descent down the castle wall to the casement below. Meanwhile, the girl's father, the spy, is on the wall with the sentry, and discerning the figures of the fugitives, seizes a rifle and fires. To his horror he finds he has taken the life of his own daughter.

The Blighted Son

Pathe Release September 9, 1912. Four Reels.

This is a story of a young man whose father is very wealthy. He leads a life of reckless dissipation until the father, learning the use his son is making of the money, refuses to furnish further funds. The young fellow thereupon commits his first crime; the crime of theft. The shock of this disgrace brings an attack of apoplexy upon the father, which makes him totally blind. From this time it is a rapid drop to bankruptcy for the once honored family. When it is too late the young man realizes his error and determines to begin life anew. He leaves his native country for South Africa and, after fearful hardships, which develop the better side of his character, he returns to his native land—a man.

Fire at Sea

Pathe Release August 26, 1912. Two Reels.

An old sea captain, a slave to liquor, is hired to sail the schooner "Joanna" with a cargo of gunpowder for a revolutionary project. A young man sails with him, against the advice of his sweetheart, who has a premonition of evil. When a few days out to sea, and while the young sailor is asleep, the skipper drinks until he is irresponsible. He goes into the powder room smoking his pipe. Soon he falls asleep and the pipe, dropping from his hand, ignites the powder. A deafening roar and the vessel is a mass of flames, leaving a wreck-strewn sea and a red glow in the sky to tell a waiting sweetheart the story of her lover's fate.

Rip Van Winkle

Vitagraph Release August 19, 1912. Two Reels.

This legend is written by Washington Irving, of the time of George III of England, during the occupation of this country by the English in the 18th century. The story of Rip Van Winkle, the happy-go-lucky, ne'er-do-well, is well known to every child. Rip Van Winkle is portrayed by that eminent actor, Mr. Robert McWade, Sr., who was associated for so long with the famous Joe Jefferson. The splendid Vitagraph Company carry out the other parts in their usual creditable way.

Rameses, King of Egypt

Cines Release August 12, 1912. Two Reels.

A production of unparalleled magnificence, depicting a thrilling romance, laid in the days of ancient Egypt.

King Rameses, hearing of the beauty of a young shepherdess, disguises himself as a peasant and journeys to her home. She resents his ardent advances and tells him of her devoted lover, a shepherd, tending his flocks on the mountain slopes.

The King, angered, has her carried off by force to his palace. Although rejected, he determines to win her with lavishness, but without avail.

The shepherd, hearing of his lover's abduction, vows vengeance on King Rameses and attempts to stab him.

When again the king's advances to the shepherdess are rejected, he orders the two lovers before him and, in all the magnificence of the Egyptian court, he magnanimously commands their marriage to take place.

The splendor of the Oriental Courts, wonderful processions and ceremonies are all shown in a story not soon forgotten.

Don Juan and Charles V

Pathe Release July 29, 1912. Two Reels.

Charles V, abdicated the Spanish throne in favor of his son, who became Philip II. Almost the first thing Philip did was to fall in love with Lucinda, a beautiful Spanish maid, who was practically betrothed to Don Juan, a young student. Don Juan insults the new king when he finds him forcing his attentions upon Lucinda. Don is arrested and Lucinda brought to the torture chamber to see him suffer in the hope that in order to save him she will consent to marry the King. Charles V is informed of the situation and, coming out of the monastery to which he has retired, he astounds the younger men by acquainting them with the fact that they are brothers. He makes them pledge their loyalty to one another, asks Lucinda to choose between the two men and when she and Don Juan embrace, gives them his blessing.

Kalem Release July 22, 1912. Two Reels.

A visit of a Confederate officer to his betrothed and her family is interrupted by a young man and his crippled sister who have been made paupers by the ravages of the war. The young pauper proclaims his love for the young lady of the house, and in order to demonstrate his bravery and loyalty, enlists in the Confederate cause. Some months later the young soldier rescues his rival, the Confederate officer, from a burning bridge. A year elapses, and the pauper has been promoted to a lieutenancy. The Confederates are entrenched before Petersburg, and the Federals succeed in mining a part of the Confederates' outer works, but their batteries are discovered in time to frustrate their plans. The Confederates place a small detachment under command of the poor, young lieutenant, to keep the nearby batteries working. The officer whose life has been saved, realizes the danger to the young lieutenant, forges an order, relieving him of that hazardous duty and takes command himself. The mine is exploded and the gallant officer and his men are killed.

The Money Kings

Vitagraph Release July 15, 1912. Three Reels

This is a story of a conspiracy on the part of the Money Kings to involve the United States in a war. A representative of the United States government starts for the peace conference at The Hague, with the President's signature on an agreement of peace. The Money Kings employ a clever woman, as their secret agent, to trap the young representative and steal the precious document. A little dinner "for two" is arranged, during the course of which the woman conspirator removes the document from the young representative's coat and replaces it with one that resembles the original. The daughter of one of the Money Kings learns of the conspiracy and that the original document is in her father's safe. On a pretense she opens the safe, extracts the original message and, in turn, replaces it with one to resemble it. She sends a wireless message to the young representative on his way to The Hague, telling him of the conspiracy and to watch for her cousin in his hydroplane, bearing the original message. The Money Kings are foiled.

flirtation just to tantalize Joe. A Sunday school picnic is now planned and a rather novel scheme is decided upon. The name of each girl and boy is placed inside the lunch boxes, and then these boxes are to be drawn and the couples are paired off according to the names. Richards is right in his glory and, discovering the lunch box in which Marian has placed her name, publicly announces that he will marry the girl he lunches with. Marian's sister, Florence, overhears him, substitutes Miss Simkin's name for Marian's and, arriving at the picnic grounds, auctions off the lunch boxes. Richards eagerly outbids Joe, gets the lunch box, hunts out Marian, opens the box triumphantly and is badly stung to find the name of Miss Simkins inside. Florence takes care to let the spinster know, and the boarding house lady immediately starts off in pursuit of the discomfited city chap while Joe, with Marian clasped in his arms, roars with laughter at the funny sight.

THE LETTER (Oct. 30).—Carleton Kirby, a thieving politician, offers Senator Denton ten thousand dollars to vote for his bill in the Senate. Denton refuses and angrily dismisses Kirby from the house. Later in the day, however, Denton changes his mind and writes Kirby a letter agreeing to vote for the bill of the offer still holds good. This letter he neglects to mail and leaves it in his desk. Called out of town, Denton is seated in the railway station when his disorganized brain conjures up a vision of himself on the floor of the Senate, congratulated first by his colleagues for putting the bill through and then, as the price of his vote is discovered, surrounded by a cursing, angry mob, who threaten his very life. Hastening to a telegraph office Denton wires his daughter, Renee, to destroy the letter in his desk addressed to Kirby. Winslow, a friend of Kirby's, discovers the contents of the wire, hastens to Denton's home, secures the incriminating letter, substitutes a blank in its place and takes it at once to Kirby who conceals it in the top of his hollow walking-stick for safety. The theft is discovered and Denton realizes he is trapped. A detective is employed, but fails to find the letter in Kirby's house. To save her father, Renee now adopts a disguise of a lady agent, hires a tough to shoot and scream under Kirby's window and, in the excitement secures the letter from the hollow cane. Returning home she restores it to her father, and with a prayer of thanksgiving in his heart he takes her in his arms and gives thanks for his salvation.

THE FISHERMAN'S LUCK (Oct. 31).—Fishley and his daughter arrive at the summer resort, and Dolores is introduced to Mr. Steppling, who plays at the summer theater. Fishley discovers them together one morning and angrily orders Steppling to cease his attentions. Steppling tells his troubles to his friend Calvert, and waits an opportunity to get even with Fishley. It comes when the old man dons his fishing togs and bikes down to the brook to catch a few live ones. Tacking a sign lettered "No Fishing Allowed" to a nearby tree, Steppling disguises as a constable and Calvert rigs up as a tramp. Each now secures a string of fish, then Steppling interrupts old Fishley in his fishing and starts to place him under arrest. In the exictement Fishley falls in the brook, scrambles out and takes wildly to his heels. Removing his disguise Steppling hastens after him and finds him buying Calvert's string of fish. Old Fishley is now given the surprise of his life when Calvert removes his disguise, but Steppling agrees to keep it a secret if Fishley will allow him to court Dolores. Fishley agrees; they present him with both strings of fish and he is telling the greatest fish story on record at the hotel when Steppling's former sweetheart exposes the whole scheme by telling she saw the boys giving Fishley the fish. Therefore all parties are stung.

THE MOVING FINGER (Nov. 1).—Stumbling into the squalor of her miserable tenement room the woman, a wretched victim of drink and dissipation, sinks down at the table and lights the half-burned candle. Slowly the memories of other days return and we see her happy with her husband in their humble cottage. Then one morning a motor car stops at the gate and the man enters for a drink of water. Their eyes meet, and the man goes away with a smile of satisfaction. Returning next day he finds her alone, points out her humble surroundings, paints a glowing picture of the gay city life and begs her to come with him. She hesitates—and is lost. That evening her husband returns and finds a note on the table saying she could stand the poverty no longer and has gone with one who can give her the luxuries she craves. In the mad swirl of the city the woman is very happy, then one night the man enters and she discovers the gloves of the other woman in his pocket. Furiously she denounces his perfidy and he leaves her. Repentance has come and the woman writes her husband, begging forgiveness and asking him to take her back. "You have made your bed; lie in it," is the answer that is returned her and the scene slowly fades to the misery of the tenement room. With every hope crushed the wretched woman slowly shreds the letter, smiles bitterly snuffs out the sputtering candle and sinks down upon her cot as the light fades into blackness.

THE MOTHER OF THE RANCH (Nov. 2).—Dan Hart, a ranchman on the Mexican border, starts for a distant town with a load of cattle, leaving his wife and daughters alone in the house. Several hours later one of the girls is getting water at the creek when she hears the sounds of battle and discovers the Mexicans and rebels are fighting again. Hastening to the ranch house she tells her mother and the woman prepares for any emergency. That night four of the rebels cross the border line, discover the flag flying in the ranch house yard and are hauling it down when one of the girls fires from the window and wounds one of their number. Pretending friendship the rebels gain entrance to the house, overpower the girls and imprison Mrs. Hart in an upstairs bedroom. The brave woman manages to free her bands, lowers herself from the window, swims across the creek to the barn, saddles a horse and rides madly for the sheriff. Meanwhile, the rebels find some liquor in the house and become boisterous. Watching their opportunity the girls manage to escape and take refuge in the barn. Galloping into town Mrs. Hart spreads the news and starts back on a wild ride with the sheriff and posse. Discovering the flight of the girls the rebels are reeling out of the house when the posse dash up. The ruffians attempt to escape to the woods, but are shot down by the enraged cowboys. Returning to the ranch house the boys find Mrs. Hart and her daughters clasped in her husband's arms.

BIOGRAPH.

AT THE BASKET PICNIC (Oct. 28).—Dave is invited to the Sunday-school basket picnic and calls for his girl on the way out, but in the schoolyard he meets his hated rival, a well-dressed chap, who is quite attractive to the village maidens. Dave excels in one thing over the well dressed chap—pugilistic qualifications, which he makes use of in whipping his rival, but by so doing he disgraces himself before the pastor and pupils of the school. Later on, however, Dave is given a chance to prove himself a hero in the eyes of all.

A REAL ESTATE DEAL (Oct. 28).—Two clerks, who are in love with their employer's daughter, are given a chance to prove their mettle by the father. The plan is as follows: The clerk who disposes of a certain piece of property which has been on their books for a long time, will be considered the daughter's accepted suitor. Off they start, vying with each other in their alluring persuasions to the several customers who go in search of real estate. Their strenuous endeavors are the source of extremely comic situations.

THE MUSKETEERS OF PIG ALLEY (Oct. 31).—Much is printed from time to time in the newspapers of the workings of the gangsters, but the public gains but a vague idea of the actual facts. Hence this picture production, which does not run very strong as to plot, is simply intended to show vividly the doings of the gangster type of people. Much has been done, and is still being done, to wipe out this evil which has long been a menace to the respectable citizen and this picture shows the situation as it is, and the extreme necessity for radical action on the part of the authorities. While the theme of the story is decidedly interesting, it also serves as a consistent vehicle to present the facts.

A PAIR OF FOOLS (Oct. 27).—Pearl is stopping at the only hotel in a western town. Jack and Joe meet her and she flirts with first one and then the other. Each tries to hide the fact of his flirtation from the other. Accidentally they both call on Pearl at the same time, only to find her very much taken up with Chester, a city drummer. Jack and Joe throw Chester out of the hotel, and then leave Pearl, vowing never to see her again, but each tries to steal a march on the other, and visits her again, but she will have none of them, having again taken up with the smart city drummer.

THE BLONDE LADY (Oct. 27).—George and Mabel are in love. Mabel's father is opposed to George and his suit. George writes Mabel a letter, asking her to meet him at Darling's restaurant. Father gets hold of the letter, and decides to meet George himself, taking with him a large club. Mabel warns George. George disguises himself as a blonde lady and keeps the appointment. George flirts with father and they dine together. Father is very much smitten, and George steals father's hat. George then runs out on father, who does not know what to make of it until he arrives at home, only to find George and Mabel planning their wedding day. Father raises a row until George threatens to expose his wild actions and career in the restaurant, and father has no other course left open to him than the giving of the parental blessing.

A KENTUCKY FEUD (Oct. 24).—Buck and Jeff, cousins, are the last two males left in the McCall clan to continue the feud between the McCalls and the Buckners. Jeff falls in love with Almyry Buckner, daughter of old Simon Buckner. Buck McCall, having been in hiding from the sheriff before young Jeff met Almyry, finally returns to the old home and learns of Jeff's marriage. He meets a pretty little child, who says she is Honey Bee McCall. He takes a great liking to her. Through the untiring efforts of Preachin' Dan, the feud is dropped and a general reconciliation follows.

THROUGH A HIGHER POWER (Oct. 27).—Antonio, a handsome Mexican, is in love with Estella, a Mexican maiden, but an attractive American girl arrives and fickle Antonio immediately falls in love with her. Upon learning of this the Mexican maiden attempts to stab her lover. He overpowers her and sneeringly dismisses her. Then in order to rid himself of her altogether, and to further his ends, he steals the money from the strong-box and accuses her of the theft. She is sent to prison for a term of years. He marries the American girl, who is an adventuress, and one day shortly after runs away with her American lover, taking all the money with her. The Mexican maiden, while crossing the prison corridor, beholds Antonio being led to confinement for a crime committed by him as a result of his American wife's treachery.

POWERS.

JUST A WOMAN (Oct. 25).—Mamie, a girl of the underworld, whose only education has been that of crime, becomes a daring house-breaker and succeeds in looting many of the apartment houses and private residences in the suburbs. Completely nonplussed, the police are obliged to call in special detective service, and a noted sleuth is assigned to the case.

Detective White frequents the haunts of the girl, finally meeting and ingratiating himself in the role of a lover. Disguised as one of the habitues of the dive, he tries for some time to secure damaging evidence, but is unsuccessful. In his attentions to Mamie he arouses the jealousy of big "Bill," a notorious crook, whose suspicions are aroused as to the detective's true calling. Through persistent shadowing, he finds his suspicions correct and just as the detective had planned to make a clean haul, denounces him before the gang and in the hearing of the girl.

Although thoroughly disillusioned, the girl cannot forget the one good influence that entered her life, and as the gang is about to wreak its vengeance, she throws herself upon the gun in the hands of "Big Bill" and in the struggle, receives the shot intended for the detective.

THE SKELETON (Oct. 28).—Doctor Tilton, a well known professor, orders a skeleton, so that he can better demonstrate to his students the various parts of the human anatomy. When the same is delivered by the express company, his two children, Matty and Early, are with him when he unpacks it, and again the scheming minds of the youngsters devise new plans to further test the patience of their elders. The incidents leading to the final downfall of both the skeleton and the children cause many a hearty laugh, as this time the children suffer more than the patience of the grown-ups.

THE NEW MESSINA (Oct. 23).—This film shows the views of this world-famed city and the wonderful strides which the inhabitants have made in rebuilding the territory which was entirely wiped out by the great catastrophe of some time ago. Although mankind is weaker than the elements, the energy and perseverance shown by the people of this territory is well worth thinking of.

KING, THE DETECTIVE, AND THE OPIUM SMUGGLERS (Oct. 24).—King, the detective, is sent to try and capture some opium smugglers that are operating in a seaport town. He arrives at the place and disguises himself in rough clothes and mixes with the fishermen. One day while walking along the shore, King sees two children (a boy and a girl), fighting. He rushes to separate them and reaches the children just as a young lady does, who turns out to be the children's sister. He accompanies them home and meets Jane's father and the bully who is very much in love with Jane. The bully is jealous of King on first sight and when King and bully meet at the saloon and dance hall, the bully starts a fight, but they are separated by the crowd.

One night King is followed by the bully, who attacks him and knocks him there. The bully goes after his gang with the intention of getting them to help him do away with King. The boy, in the meantime has seen the bully run home and tells his sister. They run to the shed and unbind King and get him in a row boat and he starts to row away. In the meantime, the bully and his gang discover that King has been released. The bully's gang desert him and he goes looking for King alone. He sees him in the row boat, weak and exhausted, and gets into another row boat, catches King and chops a hole in his boat.

Jane and her brother and sister are afraid to go home after the liberating of King and see the bully as he is on his way to their home. Jane sends the boy to follow him. The boy hears the bully tell the father what he has done to King. The boy rushes to tell his sister, they get a motor boat and rescue King just as his boat is about to sink. The bully and his gang are afterwards arrested as the opium smugglers, and all ends happily with Jane in love with King.

NESTOR.

BETTY'S BANDIT (Oct. 21).—Jack Parsons obtains a job with rancher Cole. He tumbles across Betty one day when she is being annoyed by a mean Mexican. He punishes the man and takes Betty home. Later Jack is out hunting for "strays" when he stumbles upon Mexican Pete. He springs at the astonished Jack, who wrests the Mexican's gun from him, but is not quick enough to avoid an ugly wound from a dagger. Pete escapes.

Jack picks up the jeweled handle dagger which Pete has dropped, hurries to the nearest habitation, which is the farmhouse owned by Betty's father. Betty is taking in the washing, but waits for the handsome, tired looking boy with a smile on his face. He asks for water and she notices the bloody handkerchief on his arm, makes him dismount and assists him to a bench. She ministers to him and binds his arm, and despite her mother's and her own protests, he insists upon going. Betty walks with him to his horse and admires the pretty dagger. Jack begs her to accept it and she does so. Not wanting her mother to think she is forward she secretes it in her room.

The following day her father brings in a proclamation offering a reward for the capture of the hold-up and mentioning the fact that the bandit had a jeweled dagger stuck in his belt. Betty feels the world slipping away from her feet and steals upstairs to her room. She can hardly believe the handsome cowboy can be such a bad character, but how about the jeweled dagger? The worthy farmer, with two assistants, rides out intent upon earning the reward. They are successful and come across the exhausted Mexican, whom they secure after a short struggle. The farmer takes his prize to the farm in triumph, sending one of his men for the sheriff.

Betty cannot find Jack at the ranch and is returning disconsolate and in tears, when Jack overtakes her. She begs him to fly, but he cannot see why he should. She thinks he is hardened and ungrateful, and rides away; but he follows her to the farm, where she is mystified upon seeing the sheriff, the Mexican and the dagger. Jack clears up the mystery and persuades Betty to show him the farmyard, when he contrives to tell her something interesting.

THE BORDER PARSON (Oct. 23).—John Meldon keeps a western hotel and despite his wife Mary's pleadings, he drinks too freely with the boys who frequent the hotel. At last she falls sick, and the new parson, acting upon the doctor's advice, writes May, their daughter, who is away at school. The parson next takes John to task and backed up by May, who hurries home, succeeds in convincing John that it was his conduct which led to Mary's illnes. The night of the crisis, the minister and doctor are watching beside Mary, while father and daughter wait in May's room. Mary passes the crisis and the minister hastens to May's room to tell father and daughter. As he enters, Jim, the leader of the boys, and an unsuccessful suitor, comes up the stairs to his room. He looks at his watch and finds it past midnight. The next morning, he tells the boys of the parson entering May's room early that morning and excites them to drive the parson out of town, but before this can be accomplished, John appears and makes the necessary explanation, sends Jim to his business, and hands May over to the parson, thanking him for making him see the error of his ways.

THE LADY BARBER OF ROARING GULCH (Oct. 25).—Violet De Ray opens up a barber shop at Roaring Gulch. Violet not only does a ripping good business, but she unconsciously has a hand in hurrying along several matrimonial affairs which have hung fire. This is notably the case with Si, who has loved bashfully and at a respectable distance for years. He is lured into Violet's shop, and after his chin whiskers have been clipped he emerges elated; and this coupled with Mandy's desire to protect him from such evil influences, cements a long drawn out romance.

Marcia Allen is a flirt. Her pa takes her to the window, so that she may see her Jack being patted and petted, after which Marcia is not so coy. Pa's desire to get into the lady barber's shop never consummates, owing to Ma's vigilance, and when Pa, with malice aforethought, injures his hand so that he cannot shave himself, Ma officiates with disastrous results as far as Pa's beauty and comfort are concerned.

The ladies of Roaring Gulch eventually meet and decide to oust this interloper and innovator. They swoop down upon her in a body; they look through the widow and see the minx kissing a gentleman of Italian extraction. They enter and make themselves very unpleasant and discover that the man is Violet's husband. Violet is persuaded to leave and does so in good financial circumstances, and Bill, the barber's smile returns and he does his customary business as of yore.

MILANO.

KELLY GOES TO WAR (Oct. 26).—Kelly loved his sweetheart and the girl loved Kelly, but her father wouldn't consent to his daughter marrying a namby-pamby sort of gentleman. He was a veteran and his son-in-law must bear the scars of battle and have trophies galore. Kelly went to enlist, but the army didn't want him. Undaunted, he went to a collector of war junk and he bought enough equipment to outfit a whole battalion. He chartered a boat and placing his formidable armament aboard with the cannon well in front of his rowboat started out to win the laurels of the carnage of battle and come home triumphant. But even a brave soldier must eat, and so when Kelly started to cook he forgot all about the ammunition around him. Up went the ammunition and up went Kelly. But he was wearing the talisman of love and he landed right in the midst of a big battle. With a whirl that sent the enemy flying he grabbed a flag. Before the routed warriors knew what he was about he made a dash for the ocean, for Kelly was in a hurry to get back and claim the girl. With as large a collection of trophies as any militant warrior ever could conceive of, he presented himself at his prospective father-in-law's and claimed honor as a veteran and his girl. He won both.

BISON.

HUNTED DOWN (Oct. 22).—John Dayton is shot by George Willis in a saloon quarrel. The deed is seen by Arline Marsdon, who gives Willis money and a marked time table, whereby he escapes and goes further West. Mrs. Dayton is determined to bring the murderer to justice and engages the services of Craig Burton, a detective. Burton collects the evidence and by means of a pierced ace of spades, a handkerchief and the marked time table, he tracks Willis to the edge of the desert. Willis is made aware of the detective's presence and hits the desert trail. He is followed and shot by Burton, who revives him and brings him back to justice.

A DAUGHTER OF THE REDSKINS (Oct. 26).—A regiment of cavalry surprises the Sioux and puts them to flight. Colonel Graham and others personally attend to the wants of the wounded, and the Colonel finds a wounded squaw in one of the tepees, with a little girl crouched in terror by her side. The Colonel sends for a canteen, gives the squaw water and promises to look after the child after the mother dies. The Colonel takes the child home, where she is raised. Fifteen years pass and Nechia, the Indian girl, is educated at Carlisle, where she purchases some beautiful Indian dresses. She returns to the Colonel's home and soon becomes the object of admiration to the Lieutenants Stark and Lee. Stark later proposes and is accepted.

Old Chief Gray Eagle, of the Sioux warriors, jumps the reservation and commits outrages. Colonel Graham receives orders to ride against the Indians and to punish them. Nechia learns for the first time that Gray Eagle is her grandfather and blood begins to tell and her sympathies turn to her native race.

The Indians attack a small settlement, which is rescued by the timely arrival of cavalry. Many Indians are taken prisoners, including the implacable Gray Eagle. At the fort he comes face to face with Nechia and he tells her she is a daughter of the Sioux.

Colonel Graham treats with the tribe, offering to release Gray Eagle if they will return to the reservation. The Indians refuse. As the troops ride out, Nechia steals to the window of Gray Eagle's cell. He commands her to go and tell the braves to fight. He gives her a feather from his hair. Nechia obeys. She reaches the Indian camp in time to prevent their making peace terms, tears off her riding costume, disclosing her Indian garb underneath. She is henceforth all Sioux. The braves attack the officers and kill a number of them. The Indians, led by Nechia, attack the fort, capture it and release Gray Eagle. As reinforcements ride up Nechia stands beside Gray Eagle. Stark comes up and not understanding the situation runs to Nechia. Gray Eagle fires as Nechia throws herself between them, and she dies in Stark's arms.

ECLAIR.

ROSIE (Oct. 29).—Mary one day finds in her fiance's possession a postcard from his friend Tim concerning his "Rosie," whom the writer declares to be a "beaut." In a fit of jealousy Mary gives her John his engagement ring, and flounces off to a summer resort to nurse her wounded pride in solitude.

She finds little of the desired privacy in the gay hotel, and she seeks it on the ocean waves in a light canoe. Not being a graduate in navigation, she comes to grief, and crawls up, wet and much annoyed, upon an uninhabited island. The first object she comes upon, lying under an oak tree like a dropped acorn, is her John. Mary's annoyance is considerably increased when she learns from him that they two are marooned there as hopelessly as Crusoe. She spurns his offer of his own dry clothing, and they agree to meet as little as they can.

As night comes on, the cold becomes stronger than her pride, and she is glad to creep out from behind her rock and beg for the comfort of the rejected coat. By morning the aching void where her breakfast should be puts another crimp in her spirit. Mary gets an object lesson in the high price of food. They breakfast on a microscopic fish, the best specimen that the incomplete angler, John, can lure to his hook; but not until the mischievous lover has first secured his payment in kisses from the famished and exasperated Mary. In view of the dimensions of the meal the cost of living seems to Mary unreasonably high.

In short, John improves the advantage of his position so thoroughly that by the time they are rescued by a passing doryman and taken back to the hotel Mary has all but forgotten her rage against that mean horrid "Rosie." John shows her to Mary through his spy glasses, dancing innocently on the waves, her name written in beautiful gilt letters about her stern, "ROSIE!"

THE TRANSGRESSION OF DEACON JONES (Oct. 31).—Deacon Hiram Jones is tendered the nomination for Mayor of his town on the Purity League ticket, which has for its platform the establishment of a curfew law and the abolition of the moving picture business. The deacon's daughter, Mollie, is in love with Dave Baker, but the deacon will not allow her to have anything to do with him on account of his being in the hated moving picture business.

A few months before the election, the deacon attends the County Fair, and unknown to him, a moving picture concern is taking views in the Fair grounds. The deacon is attracted by a three-shell game, and getting the fever, places a few bets on the elusive pea. He is arrested for gambling, but buys the officer off.

Just before the election for Mayor takes place, Dave, in his service, gets the reel showing the County Fair scenes. He runs the picture off before the show commences and sees the good deacon playing the three-shell game. Dave realizes that he has the deacon where he wants him and sends for him to come to the theater. The deacon does so and is horrified on being shown the picture. He begs Dave not to show it, but without success until at last Dave offers to compromise with Mollie as the basis. It is a bitter pill for the deacon to swallow, but rather than face the results of the picture being shown, finally consents, much to the delight of his daughter and future son-in-law.

A STUDY OF THE FLY (Nov. 1).—This film discovers the dangerous little insects swarming about the dead and decomposing body of a hog. There the fly is seen feasting on foul flesh and then crawling under this carrion body to lay its eggs. We are shown the generation of its larvae into life and the peculiar phenomena which it has of decaying flesh that it may obtain its nourishment. Then, as maggots, which is their common term, they are shown crawling into the decayed recesses of the flesh, there to remain till they break their shell and issue forth as flies.

THE MENDER, THE PIPE AND THE VASE (Nov. 1).—Gontran has a model wife. His wishes are hers and her wishes are his. "Ah! If I only had a good pipe." "Oh! If I only had a pretty vase." She loves flowers and he likes to smoke a good pipe.

The following day Mr. Gontran surprises his wife by giving her a vase, while she gives him a pipe. Later Mrs. Gontran complains that he is trying to smoke her out and she throws the pipe out of the window. Mr. Gontran finds that his wife is trying to crowd him out with her flower mania and throws the vase out of the window. Pipe and vase come crashing at the feet of a porcelain mender, who is passing on the street. He mends the broken articles. Mr. and Mrs. Gontran regret, however, their hasty action. The mender brings the mended pipe and vase up and becomes a medium for reconciliation. Mr. Gontran presents his wife with the vase and Mrs. Gontran offers her husband the pipe, and the mender has mended their shattered joys.

CHAMPION.

THY WILL BE DONE (Oct. 21).—Bob Shirley, who is in want, is befriended by Joe Morgan and his eleven-year-old daughter, Gertie. Bob later becomes Morgan's partner, and one day while they are out prospecting, Morgan is killed. His dying words to Bob were to take care of his little girl. Bob strikes a rich claim and sends Gertie to an Eastern school.

Five years later Bob goes to live with his ward in the East. He is secretly in love with her, but upon reaching the city he finds that she is in love with a young man named Foster. Bob gives his consent to the marriage.

After three years of married life, Foster pays attention to a designing woman. Bob reprimands him for his actions, and one night he arrives at Foster's home just in time to prevent him from doing bodily harm to his wife. In his endeavor to escape he falls down the fire-escape and is killed. Gertie is filled with grief and again turns to her guardian for protection.

THE ANGEL OF THE STUDIO (Oct. 25).—Little Roxie is a worshiper of artists, and is particularly interested in two of them occupying offices in the building, one by the name of Duncan Andrews, because he is successful, the other Charles Moss, because he is unfortunate, due to his dissipation.

When Moss apprises Roxie of the fact that his rich uncle is going to pay him a visit the following afternoon and that he is dejected because he can only show a poorly equipped studio, she tells him that she will manage to have Andrews out at the time his uncle is due and that he can show him Andrews' lavishly furnished studio. The idea appeals to Moss, and he receives his avuncular relative in Andrews' studio.

While Moss is entertaining his uncle, Roxie meets Andrews, who has returned to get at the bottom of things. She takes him into Moss' miserably furnished studio, where she explains everything to him. He agrees to aid her in anything and goes to the perturbed Moss and shakes his hand as though he were a dear friend.

When Moss' uncle asks to let him see how he works, Roxie again helps him out by posing for him. While she is arraying herself one of Andrews' models appears. Moss and the model become fascinated at once, and while she is away donning a Grecian costume, Roxie appears and mounts the dais. Her appearance mortifies Moss, who orders her off and places the model thereon.

The uncle takes his departure and tells his nephew that as he is going very nicely, he needs no help. Moss gets furiously angry at Roxie, but his madness is soon cooled down by the check for $5,000 which the avuncular relative had given to Roxie with instructions to give it to Moss as soon as he had gone. This pacifies Moss, who gains Andrews' permission to take the model down to his own studio to paint her portrait. And poor Roxie's reward for her kindness is to watch the two go into the studio and shut the door in her face.

THE TRIALS OF FAITH (Nov. 2).—The Allens have a pretty daughter, Priscilla, whom they are very anxious to see married to John Winthrop, the finest lad in old Plymouth town. The parents of the young people arrange for the match, and all would have gone well, but on the day that the papers were to have been signed and the engagement entered into, Faith, a poor relation of the Allens, arrived from England. John loses his heart to Faith and she returns his affection.

This does not make Faith any too much of a favorite at the Allens and Priscilla's treatment of the stranger is particularly harsh. One day in the woods, Faith is kind to an Indian. In turn he teaches her the value of the herbs and the healing qualities of the various plants. A little child is taken ill in Plymouth town and Faith, with her knowledge of woodland remedies, cures him. She is called upon to attend others and she does everything so well that Priscilla sees a chance for her revenge. She spreads the information throughout the town that Faith must be a witch, else how is she able to affect such marvellous cures. The governor has Faith arrested and the girl is condemned to be hung. John, in despair, goes to the Indians and secures their help. At the last minute—just as the fire is about to be applied—he dashes in with his Indian followers and snatches the girl from the very arm of death.

MEN WHO DARE (Oct. 30).—George Mortimer steals money from the bank in which he is employed, is arrested and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. Ruth, his wife, pays him frequent visits. At the prison factory, under the old doctor's regime, whether a convict is well or not, he is put to work. George, who is not very strong, is examined by Dr. Randolph, the new prison doctor, and is found to be unfit for the labor. He is sent to the prison hospital. This move on the part of the new doctor invokes the animosity of the warden in charge of Mortimer, and he writes Ruth that she will not be permitted to see her husband again.

The girl comes at once to the prison and asks the warden how her husband is. He replies that he is well and happy. But just at this moment George is brought in from the hospital. She hears her husband speak in very favorable terms of the new doctor and she determines to follow him home that night.

The prison factory foreman sees her with the doctor and brings the news to the warden. They plan to have the doctor removed and to get a sworn statement from Ruth to the effect that she had been at the doctor's home. This she at first refuses to do, but seeing how cruelly they treat a dying convict, and fearing that her husband will be treated accordingly, she promises. A host of reporters are brought in to hear the woman's story. As she is beginning to tell it George comes out just in time to hear how his wife accuses the doctor. He denounces her accusations and tells the assemblage how good the doctor has been to him. After his passionate defense of the doctor, George falls dead. The reporters force the warden to resign, showing him no mercy for his fiendish act, while the doctor gently leads the prostrated widow away.

A COUNTRY SCANDAL (Oct. 22).—The happy Parisian household of an officer in the treasury department is more or less deranged by his promotion to the governorship of a small country province. He and his wife, although pleased at the advance, dislike very much the isolation from their good boulevards. His wife, beautiful and vivacious, creates a decided impression upon the gentlemen in the town of their new residence. The Parisienne, while without any intention of flirting, cannot help it, because of the fact of her charms making a very good eye-full for the beauty lovers among the rurals. The matrons are much scandalized and all almost gossip their middle-aged lives away over the entirely innocent doings of the governor's lady. In desperation at the continued thralldom of their husbands, they write a letter to the head of the treasury department in Paris, telling him that a great scandal is disturbing the peace of their city, and ask that he investigate. An inspector is sent, who himself succumbs to the charms of the Parisienne. The inspector has a tendency to inspect too minutely and he gives a very striking imitation of a man making love to another man's wife. The Parisienne angrily repudiates his advances and he is more or less orally ejected from the house. He is not a bad fellow at heart, however, and not resenting his discomfiture, he decides to do the exiles a good turn. He realizes that they are uncomfortable in their suburban situation and pine for their gayer city. He recommends the regime of the governor to his employer so highly that the latter is recalled to Paris to a position superior.

LOVE (Oct. 24).—Love shows the harrowing experience of a literary gentleman when one of his productions tells those who have "passed 16" to cheer up, that the sun of love is about to rise for them. It takes three letter carriers to carry the mash-notes he receives. He keeps an appointment with a lady who signs herself "past sixteen." When he gets there, there are about thirty ladies of the maiden state who look as though they had passed sixteen at a dead gallop and look as though they had left it twenty years behind. The disappointed author seeks to lose his admirers, who, with pertinacity worthy of the love of angels, pursue him in a merry chase of the usual French destructiveness and hilarity. He finally escapes them and resolves henceforth he will devote his literary talents to writing booklets for a dill-pickle factory, and essays on the frankfurter.

CALINO MARRIES A SUFFRAGETTE (Oct. 24).—This story tells of a gentleman struck by the strong mind which had inspired a woman's rights article in a newspaper. He is married to her, or she is married to him, according to the way you look at it, and thereupon he enters upon a domestic reign of terror. She puts him through a course of sprouts, including physical training, wrestling with kitchen utensils, hooking friend wife up the back, etc. He finally turns like the proverbial worm, and shows that it is man's place in the universe to wear trousers, and in the last scenes he has friend wife eating out of his hand and giving the paw.

A DOMESTIC TREASURE (Oct. 29).—A professional pianist is beloved by a young man whose parents believe that a wife should be of the good, old-fashioned variety, who can prepare Hungarian goulash or make a feather bed, and are strongly opinionated against women who live by art alone. To prove that his choice is a housekeeper of the first water, he induces her to accept a position of slavey in his parents home. Here, by catering to their stomachs and comforts generally, she endears herself completely to the hearts of the old folks. The plot is finally revealed with blessings all around. The couple have so many children who are so musical that the family becomes a veritable domestic symphony.

THE GORGES OF ALBUQUERQUE (Oct. 29).—This is a scenic picture of nature in her wilder moods.

ZOOLOGICAL SPECIMENS OF THE POND (Oct. 31).—This is a scientific exposition of how the under-water world lives, showing the family affairs of the denizens of the aquatic world. It shows how they have to fight their way through legions of hungry enemies, how they make and wear armor that will render them teeth-proof, how these watery deeps are even more lawless than the streets of New York.

BRUGES, THE VENICE OF THE NORTH (Oct. 31).—This film treats of the island city whose pretty canals and deep azure of its skies, rival the queen of the Mediterranean.

THANHOUSER.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE (Oct. 20).—A full and descriptive review, dealing with this two-reel subject can be found in another part of this week's issue.

TAKING CARE OF BABY (Oct. 27).—The small boy was sneaking out of his home when halted by the familiar cry, "I want you to take care of the baby." The boy and the girl went down the street together and into the park. Some hours later they returned, and the brother was loud in his praise of the goodness of little sister.

Luckily for mama, she never knew what really happened in the park. The boy never knew either, and the baby didn't tell. The boy wheeled the baby sedately enough until he met some of his chums playing marbles. He accepted an invitation to join them in the game, shoved the gocart to one side, and boylike, never thought of the baby again until it was time to go home. Then, as she was asleep in the gocart, he simply started off with her.

While his attention was distracted the baby crawled out of her carriage, and this is what she did. She crossed a road, and was nearly run down by a whizzing auto; she robbed some birds of a dirty crust of bread and ate it, although mother had a hatred of germs and watched her diet carefully; she was just falling into a lake when a woman saved her; was nearly mashed flat by a piano that fell from a high window into which it was being hauled, and ended her adventures with a thrilling dynamite explosion of which she was the star. Then weary and frightened, she went back to her gocart, and it was not a bit surprising that she slept calmly.

MARY'S GOAT (Oct. 27).—John Green's fortune little by little ebbed away until at last he was forced to mortgage his home. Times did not get better for him, and finally he was told by the holder of the mortgage that unless he paid the principal at once he would lose his home.

The town's banker would not advance him money, neither would any of his friends. Despair had already seized him when he stepped into the little country store owned by William Warren, a crusty old bachelor, who was the last person in the world he would have asked to help him. But the old store-keeper actually volunteered to loan the amount needed, but he exacted one condition, which was that unless the note was paid at a certain time John Green's daughter would have to marry him. The pretty young girl did not view this condition with favor, but she and her father both felt confident that they could meet the note at maturity, so this curious condition was embodied in the note and the girl signed it.

The day the note was due, John Green went to the bank and drew out the amount necessary to pay the storekeeper. But on his way home he lost his pocketbook and the old storekeeper found it. The finder knew to whom the pocketbook belonged, but decided not to return it until after the note was due, for he wanted the girl to marry him and he knew it was the only way to win her.

But he reckoned without Mary's goat. The intelligent animal delivered Mary from her trying position and sent the wicked old storekeeper from the little home.

PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE (2 reels) (Oct. 29).—On page 226 of our issue dated October 19, a full and descriptive story of this subject, as reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison, can be found.

THE LITTLE GIRL NEXT DOOR (Nov. 1).—Helen Randall and Ruth Foster were little tots. The two children lived side by side on one of the fashionable streets in New York City. One day Helen and her parents were starting for the park when the little one suggested that they invite Ruth to go with them. The idea pleased them all, and as for Ruth, she was in an ecstacy of delight. She skipped down the steps into the Randall's automobile, and her father (a widower), watching her as the machine whizzed off, realized more than ever the little treasure he possessed.

At the park the two children got into a boat unobserved by their elders and drifted into the lake. In total ignorance of their peril they frolicked about the flimsy craft until it suddenly capsized and two little figures were hanging to the gunwale. Randall swam out to the boat. Even his love for his child made him hesitate to take her to the shore first until the little Ruth assured him she was safe, that she would stay on the boat until he returned.

But when he returned, and with him her frightened father, the little form that they brought to land was still, the child had slipped from the boat and drowned while he brought his own child to safety.

The loss of his little girl made Foster almost frantic, and he became as vindicative an enemy to Randall as he had been a friend. A power in Wall Street, step by step he smashed the latter back in the merciless warfare of the street, until Randall, innocent of wrong though he was, stood on the brink of ruin.

But when all hope was gone, when he had brought himself to looking upon a life of poverty with the resignation born of necessity, his daughter took the matter into her own hands and John Foster, wealthy financier and lonely man, learned the lesson of forgiveness.

SOLAX.

MAKING AN AMERICAN CITIZEN (Oct. 30).—A husband and wife, belonging to the most ignorant and lowest class of peasantry, emigrate to the United States. On landing in New York, the husband loads a huge bundle on back of his wife, and carrying nothing but a rough walking-stick himself, starts to pass through the Battery, walking behind his wife. Soon a crowd gathers around them, some laughing, jeering, others indignant and threatening, until suddenly a huge American pushes his way through the crowd, stops the wife, takes the bundle off her back, lays his hand on the shoulder of the husband, bending him nearly double, picks up the bundle, places it on his back, and orders him to march on.

This is the husband's first lesson in Americanism. Other lessons follow, in which the husband is taught, with an emphasis he cannot doubt, American ways and manners, until after he has been arrested and sent to jail for beating his wife, he becomes thoroughly convinced that old world methods will not do in this strange new world and decides to become an American in spirit and in [illegible].

AT THE PHONE (Nov. 1).—Mr. Dean, a wealthy broker, at the hospital awaits with nervous expectancy the results of an operation on his wife. With impatience he paces up and down the waiting-room, and finally in order to fill in the untenable space he decides to call up his "kiddies" and gain solace in a few moments' talk with them. When central gives him the connection he hears first to his bewilderment, and then to his utter dismay and unrestrainable excitement, two strange voices saying, "Well, if the kids make a holler, we'll shut 'em up for good, eh? This safe will be easy."

Dean doesn't know whether to stay at the hospital and wait to hear the result of the operation, or run to the rescue of his little ones. He is about to rush out of the ward, when the doctors come back bearing his wife. They notice his wild excitement, and by force keep him out of her way. The strain is too great for Dean. He falls in a dead faint.

At the house before Mr. Dean had called, the nurse, in a rush to receive and hurry away with her beau, forgets about hanging up the receiver, after talking to the butcher. The burglars enter, go through the house and decide that they will not hurt the sleeping children, so long as they slept—but in discussing their plans in the library near the safe and open 'phone—which central vainly tried to have closed—they are overheard by the anxious Mr. Dean.

The burglars are surprised at their work by a wideawake policeman and the children are saved and brought to the side of their mother. When Mr. Dean is revived he starts for the 'phone to telephone the police to save his children, but to his amazement and delight, he sees them in the arms of his dear wife.

MAJESTIC.

THE TREE IMP (Oct. 27).—Rex, a rich young man, grows sick unto death of being run after, and escapes to the woods, where he comfortably settles under a big tree. An irresistible imp in the branches above mischievously tosses an apple into his lap. He invites her down, and scorning his proffered hand she jumps lightly to the ground, hugging her book and apples. They become great friends. The next day he chances to come upon the farm cottage where she lives alone with her grandmother, and the delighted imp invites him for a glass of lemonade. The two are surprised by Miss Gay (one of the many determined to catch him) who looks the imp over jealously and carries the reluctant Rex away. Jealousy springs up in the imp's heart. As for Rex, he cannot keep away from the imp. One day the imp rescues Miss Gay, who has toppled into the water. But when Rex carries Miss Gay back to the hotel the other ladies stare so scornfully at the imp's meager apparel and her glorious hair which hangs about her shoulders like a halo, that she runs abruptly away, dropping Miss Gay's hat. Rex hastens after and finds her mournfully holding out her skirts. He takes her hand, but seeing something in his eyes she runs away frightened. She begs grandma to buy her a pretty dress and when grandma flatly refuses she drops in a sobbing heap. Then seized with an inspiration she rushes to the attic and fishes an old fashioned evening dress of her mother's from a trunk. Gleefully donning it and doing her hair up in imitation of the hotel style, she strolls down before the hotel. Miss Gay and several others poke fun at her. She whirls upon them and in bliding rage lays them low, declaring that at least her hair is her own. Rex has overheard, gives the ladies a withering glance and pursues the imp, finding her sobbing against a tree. He tells her that he loves her "in any old clothes." Later, the hotel boy gives the ladies a note, saying "The imp and I are to be married—Rex."

A WOMAN ALONE (Oct. 29).—Mabel Weston falls in love with a dashing young stock broker, to whom her father takes a dislike. She marries him in spite of her father, who tells her to choose between her father and her lover. A constant gambler on the stock market, her husband finally loses his last dollar and commands Mabel to go to her father and borrow some money. She goes, and is refused the loan. She tells her husband that her father will not help them, and he rushes from the room in despair. Meanwhile, the father reconsiders his act and goes to his daughter's home with the money. Just as he is handing it to her a shot is heard and they discover that the husband has committed suicide.

Mabel starts out to support herself as a stenographer and leads a very lonely and miserable existence, due to the rude advances made by her employer. A young lawyer in an adjoining office makes her acquaintance by means of a bunch of violets. He watches Mabel constantly from his office window and one day sees her employer forcing his attentions on her. He arrives upon the scene just in time to administer a good thrashing to the employer and persuades Mabel that she need no longer be a woman alone.

THE STORY OF THE SAVAGE MODOC MINE (Oct. 23).—After-dinner speeches are being made, and the toastmaster calls upon a man named Allen, who, while apparently young in years, has snow-white hair, and he tells how his hair turned white in one night. As he speaks the scenes he describes are shown in the film.

John Allen, his father, joined the gold rush with a partner. After many hardships they finally located a good claim and worked it, securing gold beyond their wildest dreams. The partner went hunting one day and was killed by Indians, and Allen received the news from a trapper who found the body. Saddened, he resolved to come home, and sent a letter to his wife and son that he would join them in a few months. The mine caved in and buried him alive. Allen heard no further word from his father, and as time elapsed his mother died. Alone in the world he went West to search for his father, and one night as he sat alone at his camp fire a vision of the dead man appeared. The next day his hair had turned white. The spirit of his father guided him to the mine, where he secured assistance and dug out the dead man. This scene is very cleverly shown taken from the interior, and showing the picks and shovels breaking through, permitting ever widening rays of light to lighten up the inside of the mine.

HOW SHORTY KEPT HIS WORD (Oct. 30).—Jim Burns, a young lawyer, defends "Shorty," accused of moonshining. In a great courtroom scene he secures the acquittal of his client, and wins his gratitude. Burns' sweetheart, Ethel, goes on a visit to a neighboring town and comes back in a stage coach. Burns goes to meet her, and on the way his horse shies at a rattle-snake. Jim draws his revolver and shoots the reptile, continuing on the way.

Powers, a government detective, is sent to the district to secure evidence against the moonshiners, and rides in the same coach with Ethel. His unwelcome attentions are resented by Ethel, and when she meets Jim she tells him of the insults. Jim promptly knocks the detective down, and friends prevent any further trouble. "Shorty" sees the detective and recognizes him as the man who killed his brother in trying to arrest him, and "Shorty" has sworn vengeance. Ethel washes her hands at a well and Jim goes to bring her a towel. In his absence the detective appears and tries to apologize. "Shorty," concealed by a bush, fires and kills the detective, who falls at Ethel's feet. Jim rushes back as well as others attracted by the shot, and all, including the girl, believe that Jim has done the shooting. He is arrested and tried for murder.

"Shorty" in making his escape is dangerously injured by his horse falling upon him. His partner carries him to his cabin and sends for a doctor, who calls frequently on his patient. One day the doctor lays down a newspaper, which contains glaring headlines of the murder trial. "Shorty" in his weakened condition, determines to save Burns, and fighting back the doctor who seeks to detain him, he leaps on a horse and gallops to the courthouse, where he absolves Jim.

KEYSTONE

THE GROCERY CLERK'S ROMANCE (Oct. 28).—The grocery clerk's sympathies are aroused by the sight of hard-working Mrs. Brown, whose shiftless husband sits around and smokes, and spends his time at the saloon. The clerk wins Mrs. Brown's gratitude by doing the washing for her, and taking care of the chores around the house. Brown saunters out to the woods and comes upon three conspirators, who accuse him of being a spy and decide to kill him. Brown is tied to a tree stump, a charge of dynamite is placed under him, a fuse attached and lit, and Brown is saying his prayers when his little son finds him. The boy rushes home with the news, and the clerk does all in his power to prevent the rescue party reaching Brown in time. In his frantic struggles Brown frees himself and makes his escape just as the explosion takes place and the rescuers arrive. All believe him dead, and the grocery clerk immediately proposes to Mrs. Brown and she accepts him. They lose no time in getting a minister and the ceremony is about to proceed when Brown, who has gone to the village saloon to steady his shattered nerves, is informed that his wife is marrying the grocery clerk. He dashes to the scene and prevents the wedding, chases the clerk away and takes his unwilling spouse home—to work—again.

AT CONEY ISLAND (Oct. 28).—The Boob takes his girl to Coney Island, where she flirts with a married man and eludes the Boob. They visit all the amusement devices, and many comical scenes are shown as the Boob tries to get his sweetheart back again. They finally land in a ballroom, where the clumsy and heavy-footed Boob is pushed aside for the light-footed rival. His little son, however, has been on his trail and brings his mother to the scene, where she asserts herself in a positive manner and leads her erring husband away by the ear. The girl, weeping and regretful, throws herself into the arms of the happy Boob.

No Extra Charge For Features ! !

This is tremendously important! The Laemmle offices do not charge an extra penny for features. The Universal program is bristling with magnificent, stunning features every week—one-reel, two-reel and three-reel features that are actually finer than the so-called "state rights features." They're all yours without an extra cent of cost if you hook up with any Laemmle Film Service office. It's the greatest program on God's green footstool and you're overlooking a marvelous opportunity if you don't grab it! IT'S ALIVE

California "Rodeo"

The Greatest of American Round-Ups

The largest number of cowboys competing in the most dangerous, thrilling and comical "stunts" ever devised.

See the perils of the California range rider. They'll leave an indelible impression on your mind.

See the American cowboy in his glory, bulldogging wild steers that would daunt the bravest toreadors of Spain.

In fact, words cannot explain how intensely exciting and thrilling this picture is. It's alive.

Up-To-Date Picture Men Know the Value of the Right Lens

No matter how good your films may be—the success of your pictures depends upon your lens equipment. Progressive picture men are realizing more every day that the use of mean the maximum of clearness and brilliancy in the picture on the screen. Audiences know good pictures—and they are quick to patronize the show that has the best. Bausch & Lomb objectives and condensers are standard—their use will insure you sharp, clear pictures—the sort of pictures that bring the crowds back.

The Edison and Nicholas Power machines are regularly equipped with our lenses. They can be procured also through any film exchange.

It will pay you, whether owner or operator, to read our free Booklet 62-D, which contains information of value. Write for it TO-DAY.

The Superior Quality of Bausch & Lomb lenses, microscopes, field glasses, projection apparatus, engineering and other scientific instruments is the product of nearly Sixty Years of Experience.

If you are on a 110 or 220 volt circuit and you are using a rheostat to reduce the voltage to 35 at the arc in your lamp, you are paying for 2/3 more "juice" than you are actually using. Can you afford to waste all this energy supplied from the line, over and above what you really need?

The Fort Wayne Compensarc saves all this waste by reducing the voltage without losing any: makes a clearer, whiter, steadier light, and eliminates all danger of fires caused by overheated rheostats.

We have a little 22 page booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" that we want to send you. It will tell you plainly how you can make a big saving and a better light. Send us your name and address.

STORY MAGAZINE
Is Published For You

If you do not yet know what The Motion Picture Story Magazine will do for you and your theater, you can hardly be blamed for not placing it on sale.

It is doing so much for other exhibitors, that you owe it to yourself to give it a test.

We do not ask you to take our word for this. Many letters are coming to us each day, from exhibitors who are now selling The Motion Picture Story Magazine at their theaters. All of these letters are enthusiastic of the interest the magazine arouses in their patrons, the new people it brings to their theaters, the increase of gate receipts it creates, and the good it does the motion picture business.

What better proof could you ask, than the word of those who are now selling the magazine ?

Drop us a card and we will send you further particulars, and duplicate of some of these letters, or better still why not place a trial order now and test it yourself ?

Rate to exhibitors, ten cents, retail price, fifteen cents. Your profit, five cents.

Don't delay until you forget, but send in your order and remittance to-day.

G.MÉLIÈS

THE REAL MURDERER APPREHENDED

WRONGLY ACCUSED

Baird is loved by Mary, but disliked by her father, the sheriff. So they plan to elope, and an old sweetheart of Baird's, now married, agrees to aid them. Her husband misconstrues and becomes jealous. He quarrels with Baird, and when, later, he is found mortally shot, Baird is held for the crime. Only by the unwavering courage of Mary is he saved from being lynched, and when the real murderer is apprehended, the bars between the lovers are shattered. Then the sheriff relents—and consents.

POWER'S 6A Gets the Money

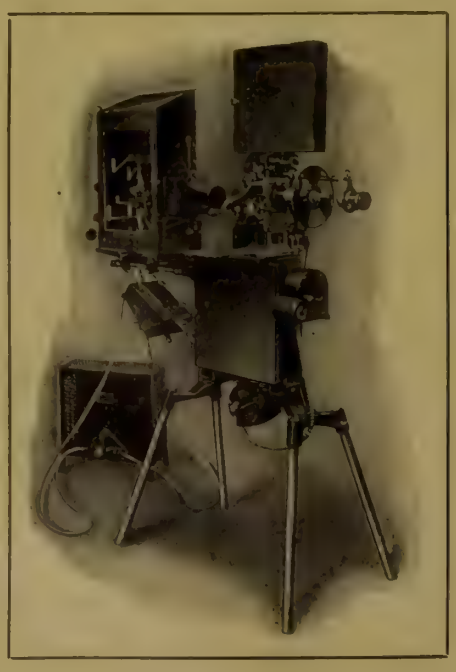
¶ POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH has staying power—and satisfies both operators and patrons alike. Where this is accomplished success is assured, and a full cash drawer results.

¶ In our new equipment No. 6A we have added the following improvements:

ARC LAMP: 100 amp. capacity, 14 adjustments, takes 3-4" carbons, 6" lower, 12" upper.

LAMP HOUSE: excellent ventilation, large and roomy with door each side, lamp more accessible.

STAND: made of iron, 14" lower magazine built in.



¶ Our new patented Loop Setter, costing but $10.00 additional, resets the lower loop automatically, doing away with the dark screen and interrupted pictures.

¶ These CAUSES make POWER'S better than ever, and the EFFECT is a perfect machine in every particular.

¶ It means good money to you, Mr. Showman. Let us send you catalogue G, giving full details.

The Ladder of Life

One man goes up the ladder, another down. They meet midway, then the story swings you to the top rung with the one and to the bottom with the other. It is a great life lesson. It will dignify your show, and silence the "picture knockers."

Friday, November 8

Through the Flames

The "big moments" in this very thrilling Thanhouser story, surpass in realism even such fire scenes as those in "Jess," "Flames and Fortune," or "The Railroad Builder." A solid brick house is demolished, an entire fire department called out and there are great leaps into life nets. The remarkable plot is itself an educator.

FEATURES OF THIS WEEK'S PROGRAM DE LUXE!

Released Tuesday, Oct. 29th.

"Miss Simkins' Summer Boarder"

A delightful pastoral comedy, chuckfull of the snappiest sort of breezy fun and real, ringing laughter. Eleanor Blanchard, Mildred Weston, Evebelle Prout, John Steppling and Whitney Raymond in dandy roles.

Released Wednesday, Oct. 30th.

"The Letter"

A gripping, powerful political drama of the present day, showing the sordidness of the great modern "machine." Points out a moral that cannot fail to impress deeply. Lily Branscombe, Harry Cashman, Frank Dayton and Bryant Washburn in feature roles.

Released Thursday, October 31st.

"The Fisherman's Luck"

Unquestionably the fishiest fish story on record. The amusing adventures of a braggart in losing both the biggest fish and his daughter in the bargain. Howard Missimer, John Steppling, E. H. Calvert and Dolores Cassinelli in feature laugh portrayals.

Released Friday, Nov. 1st.

"The Moving Finger"

A dramatic masterpiece. One of the most powerful subjects booked for the new month. The first wrong step of a good woman—and the bitterness of repentance as she gazes dumbly into blackest despair. Lily Branscombe, Frank Dayton and Harry Cashman featured.

Released Saturday, Nov. 2nd.

"The Mother of the Ranch"

A sensational Western dramatic subject, replete with thrilling situations and the turmoil of the present-day strife in old Mexico. A 1,000 feet of nerve-tingling excitement.

REEL REASON FILM FACTS

For the Careful Investor

Incontestably it has been proved that State Rights business is highly profitable to the purchaser. For the man already in the film business or to he who seeks lucrative investment there are few superior propositions—when he chooses the right product. The investor in THE VENGEANCE OF EGYPT has for assurance these affirmatives—the sterling name of Gaumont, and their sane principles, their logical viewpoint.

Uniformly above mere praise are the regular Gaumont releases. Beyond witchery of words is the result when in the instance of State Rights business, special effort is made. The Gaumont Company, realizing the colossal possibilities of feature film operations, feel keenly the necessity of producing a product commensurate with the extraordinary requirements — that there must be no variation in grade and that that grade must be premier. And upon the Gaumont principle that the interests of producer and exhibitor must be identical, is THE VENGEANCE OF EGYPT offered.

A Story Having the Potency of Poe

The theme is that of an Egyptian Princess, dead 2000 years, whose spirit is outraged by the stealing of a ring from the mummy's finger. A revenge insatiable, leaving a wake of woe extending a century's length. An atmosphere weird and interest compelling. A background of Oriental occultism wreaking the wrath of a wraith through human passions.

THE LANDSLIDE HAS BEGUN!

Hundreds of Exhibitors, Hitherto in Doubt About the Film Situation, Now Convinced That the UNIVERSAL PROGRAM is Supreme!

The Universal's complete, sweeping and sensational victory in the "Bison" and "101-Bison" settlement has given all Universal exchanges a greater impetus than any one thing that has happened heretofore. We were not aware that so many exhibitors were awaiting the outcome of this big fight before they would decide to "demand that Universal program." We did not realize how many had been misled by false claims as to the real ownership of "Bison" and "101-Bison" films. Universal exchanges, however, have been telegraphing us all week, saying in effect:—"Hammer away on that Bison victory until every exhibitor knows the truth about it. Let them know that the Bison is the property of the Universal and that they cannot get it anywhere else!" So we say again, in order that there may be no misunderstanding:

THE UNIVERSAL OWNS THE "BISON"
THE UNIVERSAL OWNS THE "101-BISON"
THE UNIVERSAL ALWAYS WILL OWN THEM!

By the terms of the settlement, Mr. Baumann and his associates pay thousands of dollars to the Universal; surrender all their stocks and bonds in the Universal Co.; surrender the "Bison" and "101-Bison" trade-marks forever.

THE UNIVERSAL Has Always Played Fair With You!
THE UNIVERSAL Has Always Told You the Truth!
THE UNIVERSAL Will Always Continue To Do So!

You know now where you stand, where the Universal stands and where you can get the best film program in the whole wide world. Once more we say:

"Demand That Universal Program" and get the kind of Quality that you've got to have to prosper.

FEATUR

"THE CALL OF THE DESERT."

Monday, October 28th.

Ben was a lover of nature. He had determined to make the pay ore yield gold. Marion loved Ben, but she wanted the city life and its mad-cap existence. Ben went with her, but when they quarreled he went back to the West. Bill's little ruse succeeded in bringing them together again. It ended just like the fairy tale. They were happy ever after.

"FATTY'S BIG MIX-UP."

Wednesday, October 30th.

In the first place, Fatty didn't want the job, and he didn't want to dress as a woman. But the pay was good, so he accepted the one and did the other. The number of comical situations which developed are too numerous to mention. A good, breezy Western comedy.

"MAKING A MAN OF HER."

Friday, November 1st.

As fast as the rancher got a new cook one of the cow-punchers married her. Emily needed a job bad and she took a chance in putting boy's clothes on and applying. Of course she was accepted. Scream after scream follows the reception of Emily at the ranch. Full of rollicking, mirth-provoking scenes.

101 BISON

"THE COWBOY GUARDIANS."

Tuesday, October 29th.

A good, strong Western, in which a good part is devoted to comedy. In fact there's more comedy in it than dramatic. A good, strong comedy-drama for the first part of the week.

"TRAPPER BILL, KING OF SCOUTS."

Saturday, November 2nd.

From the time that Trapper Bill has the first quarrel with Shunan until the big battle scene in which the Americans triumph over the Mexicans, the picture is replete with thrills. Staged with wonderful realism in the hills and dales of beautiful California.

"YVONNE THE FOREIGN SPY."

Monday, October 28th.

In which an American diplomat falls under the charms of a vivacious foreign spy. Though she uses her beauty to good advantage, and her schemes at first meet with success, her mission to secure important papers of state fails. Brilliantly produced.

"JOHN STERLING, ALDERMAN"—2 Reels.

Thursday, October 31st.

An up-to-the-minute political drama. It tells how a man, once a burglar, became an honest man, lived down his past and became an important member of the Board of Aldermen. It abounds with thrills as the exposure of graft is unfolded. King Baggot and a very superior supporting company make it a particularly worth-while release.

"FERDIE, BE BRAVE!" and "TAFT'S DAY AT THE BROCKTON FAIR."

Saturday, November 2nd.

A very funny comic on the same reel with an especially interesting educational topic.

CRYSTAL

"OH, SUCH A NIGHT!"

Sunday, November 3rd.

Pearl White, that vivacious little comedienne shows what a wife in a temper can do. Of course the husband went the limit when she crossed him. The funniest domestic entanglement you've seen in a good while.

On the Same Reel:

"MARRIAGE A LA CARTE."

George wanted a cool thousand from his Uncle and he used that gag "about to be married." He got the money, but he got more than he reckoned for. The Uncle insisted on the marriage and George got the thousand, but he got a wife with it. Exceptionally funny.

CHAMPION

"SUE."

Monday, October 28th.

A strong story of the Kentucky hills. You'll stare with wonderment when you see the child handling the big snake, the snake biting Virginia and the sacrifice made by the plucky mountain girl in saving Virginia's life because she wanted to "save her for Dave." Photographically beautiful, thrillingly emotional.

"THE COLLABORATORS."

Wednesday, October 30th.

Dick was a poet, and like all poets, he was long on the poetry and short on cash. The inevitable happened. Dick had to look for a new boarding house. Molly was in love with him and when he went away he left her his poem. The success that followed that poem is as funny as it is invigorating. Book it now.

"A DREAMLAND TRAGEDY."

Friday, November 1st.

With her awakening came the realization that her terrible tragedy had happened only in dreamland, but the dream is exciting enough to make you sit up and take notice. A new kind of dream picture, well acted, well staged.

GEM

"THE OLD DOLL MAKER."

Tuesday, October 29th.

When Lucille eloped with Villon she little realized the hardships she would encounter. Years passed and though her father had forbid her to return, he relented. A most gripping climax is portrayed when, Lucille and her family destitute, they discover a sum of money in a doll the father had sent. Pleasingly pathetic.

VICTOR

"THE REDEMPTION OF RIVERTON."

Friday, November 1st.

When the Rev. John Gibson arrived in Riverton he knew he had a big job on his hands. The town was noted for its scandal mongers and its drunkards. Gibson determined to clean it up. The way he did it and the result is most pleasing. See how Florence Lawrence, as June Martin, helped him.

Tuesday, October 29th.

Rosie was a "She," but not the kind that Mary imagined. No end of merriment after Mary returned the engagement ring. A very unique situation is portrayed when Mary and John are marooned on a desert island. Rosie was a boat, but Mary didn't know it. Comically different.

"THE TRANSGRESSION OF DEACON JONES." Thursday, October 31st.

The Deacon liked Dave well enough, but he didn't like the "moving picture business" that Dave was interested in. When they caught Deacon Hiram playing the "Shell game" at the county fair with the camera, Dave made the most of his opportunity when he got the reel. Plenty of fun.

"AUNT BRIDGET."

Sunday, November 3rd.

The Aunt's "fictitious" legacy scheme worked fine until the young people went to look into the matter, and then they saw how they had been tricked. They ousted the old lady before she had a chance to tell them she won a lot of money. Alive with fun from start to finish.

REX

"CAREFUL NURSING."

Thursday, October 31st.

Markham was the only sick man in the house when the nurse arrived, but within half an hour the four sons took sick. It would have been a long siege of sickness if the pugilist husband of the pretty nurse hadn't arrived on the scene of action and taught them all a good lesson.

"AN OLD-FASHIONED MOTHER."

Sunday, November 3rd.

The doctor knew his business, and the nurse was about as good as a nurse could be, but the child kept failing and the chances for its recovery were slight. Clandestinely the old-fashioned mother administers some of the kind of home-made medicine she used in years gone by and the child was saved. A beautiful theme, most prettily handled.

An exceptionally exciting story of the West. One sensational scene shows the blowing up of a surveying party's shack by the dynamiters. About 1,000 feet. Good Western feature.

Nov. 6th. Her Education

The story of an orphan girl of the Western range and her ambition to secure an education. Containing an excellent element of comedy and some exciting dramatic scenes. Written by Marjorie Benton Cooke. Good feature. About 1,000 feet.

Nov. 7th. Carmen Of The Isles

A romance of the South Sea Islands. A clever story told in a fascinating manner. Filled with the hot, amorous atmosphere of the Southlands. Picturesque in its backgrounds. About 1,000 feet.

Nov. 8th. The Legend of the Lost Arrow

A beautiful tale of Indian romance and sacrifice. Adapted from the original Yosemite Indian folk lore stories and myths. Cleverly portrayed. On the same reel with "Enchanting Japan," another remarkable Selig educational subject depicting the beauties of the Oriental land. About 1,000 feet.

ALL STAR CAST

TWO REELS RELEASED FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 15

An old detective sacrifices twenty-five years of honest effort for the sake of his wife and erring son. The son does not permit the sacrifice.

Romance, thrills, tears and heart-throbs permeate the story.

Stolen jewels are hidden in an old violin case. There is a spectacular chase across house-tops. The detective's son, ashamed of himself, tries to evade his father and drops from a height of four stories, almost to his death.

OTHER FEATURES

The New Love and the Old

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 6

This is a study in human nature with many original situations. His snobbish fiancee turns up her nose when he introduces her to his old mother The Boy's success had not weaned him from his "old love" and when he sees his unhappy mother suffering under the glances of his fiancee, he decided that the old love is good enough for him. He takes his mother in his arms and turns his back on his erstwhile sweetheart.

Just Hats

RELEASED FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 8

Billy is pursued by bad luck in the shape of hats. Everywhere he turns hats with a combination of circumstances conspire to effect his ruin. This is a Billy Quirk comedy with the entire Solax Comedy Cast.

"The Man They Scorned"

TWO REELS

Released Wednesday, November 6

He was a Jew — and a Soldier. Scorned and ridiculed, hazed and insulted, his poor heart nearly failed him, borne up only by the childish sympathy and affection of the Colonel's little girl. The crisis in his life is reached when, in a disastrous fight with the Indians, the soldiers are compelled to fly for their lives before the advancing hordes of Indians, and the Colonel's horse is shot under him. The Jew lifts his commander to the saddle and attempts to save both, but the load is too heavy and he leaps from the horse and forces the Colonel to ride on. Entrenched behind rocks on a hilltop he fights for his life, and when reinforcements arrive and rescue him he is terribly wounded. Through the tender care of the Colonel's family he is restored to health and is promoted for his bravery. The happiest moment in his life is when the troop gathers under his window and cheers him.

A SPLIT REEL ON MONDAY, NOV. 4

"Mabel's Lovers"

Mabel arrives at the summer resort and has many lovers. Possessed of a beautiful figure, she decides to put the men to a test, and when donning her bathing suit fills her stockings with numerous bumps. When she discards her coat at the beach all the men beat a hasty retreat with the exception of one who "peeped" when Mabel was fixing up. Her next appearance in her bathing suit, minus the ungainly protuberances causes consternation among the men who have been fooled.

"AT IT AGAIN"

This picture revives the travesty on Sherlock Holmes, in which Mack Sennett and Fred Mace won unbounded popularity. A woman receives an anonymous letter advising her that her husband is flirting, and engages the detectives. They track the wrong man and spy on him, arresting him in his own home while making love to his own wife. It develops that the man is a police captain, and the "sleuths" are punished for their error.

PARSON JAMES

Richard James, an ex-minister, took up a claim in Barston and did fairly well. Cal Cummings, a gambler, and his wife, Frisco Nell, were requested to leave town and, Nell, fearing that the tramp across the mountains would kill the little baby, left it in charge of the parson. He accepted the charge and when old enough sent little Nellie to a convent for education. A friend offered James the charge of a church some miles away and wanted Nell to marry his son, but the parson and his ward agreed that nothing should part them.

Released Friday, Nov. 1st, 1912. Length 1,000 ft.

FIXING A FLIRT

Bill Bruce, an imitation of "a man about town," flirts with Bess Bradley, a stenographer, and invites her to dinner; she puts up a job on him, and when they are seated at the table of a swell cafe, two other girls blow in; of course they have to be invited to sit down; still later others arrive until Bill finds he has eight girls to feed. The check is much too big for Bill's roll and he has to part with his watch and other ornaments, much to the amusement of the girls.

Released Thursday, Oct. 31st, 1912. Length 1059 ft.

The Heavenly Voice

Major Lee, who is much in love with the Widow Smith, enhances his suit by getting the young village blacksmith to sing under her window just before he visits her. The ruse works to perfection until one night the singer is late, and as the Major is proposing, the welcome notes are heard on the outside. The widow investigates and finds the handsome blacksmith singing a love song to her daughter.

Released Sat., Nov. 2nd, 1912. Length about 1000 ft.

The Family Next Door

Young Bob Ford and Mary Heap resolve to get married, despite their parents, who have had a difficulty. Bob and his brother Roy gather a posse of cowboys and girls, who protect an elopement. The couple get married as the old men are held up and they escape on a train. Finally the friends coddle the old men into forgiveness.

Released Monday, Nov. 4th, 1912. Length about 1,000 ft.

JUAN AND JUANITA

Juan, a Mexican peon, loses his job on the railroad, and as Juanita's mother will not permit the girl to keep company with a man who is broke, he loses his sweetheart. One day, looking for work, he finds the station agent badly wounded in the depot and sees Tony, a discharged employee, flying along the track with a consignment of stolen gold on a drill-engine. He and the station agent board a handcar and secure the robber. Juan is reinstated on the road and deeded a homestead. That night there is a joyful wedding.

Facts and Comments

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD feels that it is performing a service to the cinematographic industry and especially to the exhibitors of the country by warning them of an insidious attempt on the part of a tobacco company to promote the sale of its cigarettes through the agency of the motion picture theaters. The tobacco company is sending out circulars telling exhibitors of motion pictures that they propose to "spend $500,000 a year for the benefit of moving picture theaters." The whole thing amounts to nothing more nor less than a premium scheme. The "prize" consists of "coupons" that are to be found in the packages of cigarettes. These coupons may either be cashed or used as admissions to a motion picture theater, provided of course the exhibitor is willing to enter into this bargain. We earnestly hope that no self-respecting exhibitor will lend himself to any such nefarious scheme. The proposal is really in the nature of an insult to exhibitors, for this tobacco company would never dare to offer such propositions to the theaters, or in fact to any decent amusement enterprise. The company evidently does not realize that the average exhibitor and manager of an electric theater is just as anxious to conduct his place in a clean and respectable manner as any other theatrical manager in the country. We have no doubt that the offer of the tobacco company will be rejected and resented, and that, if necessary, every exhibitor will place above the door of his box-office a card reading "No cigarette coupons accepted here."

It is scarcely necessary to point out the many reasons for declining the offer of the tobacco company. For years THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD and every friend of the motion picture have struggled to give to the new invention a high, useful and honorable place in our modern life. After these years of unremitting efforts we are just beginning to see the signs of a harvest. The motion picture is distinctly advancing in public esteem. Manufacturers and exhibitors more than ever realize their responsibilities toward the public. They must share very largely in the credit for the uplift of the motion picture. The industry is in a prosperous condition. The honest enemies of the motion picture have been changed into friends and the hopeless fanatics are making but little noise. Even the newspapers have begun to dissociate the motion picture from small and unwashed boys and from silly farces and dime-novel versions of the "Wild West." Everything points to greater progress and continued prosperity. If the proposition of the tobacco company were to be accepted by any considerable number of exhibitors a violent reaction of public sentiment against the motion picture will be sure to follow. The sale of cigarettes is, of course, biggest among boys. The legislature of pretty nearly every State in the Union has attempted to break up this sale or to keep it within bounds. In many States the sale of cigarettes to minors is a misdemeanor. It is reasonable to assume that this anti-cigarette legislation has hurt and hampered the sale of this particular kind of tobacco. Perhaps the tobacco company hopes to stimulate this sale by making the motion picture houses distributing centers for their wares. However that may be, there is every reason in the world for the exhibitors to refuse the part assigned to them by the management of this company.

The "cigarette coupon" would bring the kind of patronage which every sensible and responsible exhibitor wants to keep away from his house. It would bring the noisy rowdies, which to our own certain knowledge have ruined more than one motion picture house. The decent and orderly people of the community would shun the house where the cigarette coupon is honored. We may be very sure that the newspapers and the enemies of the motion picture generally would seek to make capital out of such a situation. They would go to the legislatures and demand further hostile legislation against the motion picture and against the exhibitor. What answer could be made to them by the friends of the motion picture? "He is thrice armed who hath his quarrel just," but no amount of eloquence can help a bad cause. Not a word can be said in defence of such a proposed alliance between the cigarette and the motion picture.

This is a subject calling, it seems to us, for action by the organized exhibitors. Unfortunately it is in the power of one man to injure his betters in the same calling by descending to the low level where the tobacco company has placed him. To neutralize as much as possible the action of the black sheep it is well to have the organized exhibitors take a decided and public stand against the proposition and make their position known through notices in the press or in any other legitimate manner. If there is an odd exhibitor here and there who cannot see through the scheme of the tobacco company, the action of the organized exhibitors will make it plain to the public that he stands alone and is not representative of his vocation.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is not trying to set up a premature kingdom of the saints. We are only pleading for good and clean business methods. We think it is the worst kind of business to imperil the good standing of the motion picture for the sake of a few extra pennies that may come through the cigarette coupons. No kind of amusement can long endure if it does not in some measure enjoy the respect and confidence of the public. The motion picture does not want to be classed with anything verging on the borders of the illegal. The industry can be built up only if the foundations are solid and sure and sound. The motion picture has come to stay. If it is to be a permanent institution, if investors, whether in the manufacturing or the exhibiting branch expect a safe and lasting return on their caital, we must have public sentiment with us and not against us. We surely know by this time how much harm can be done by a hostile public sentiment. The motion picture has nobler and more profitable missions to fulfill than to help the sale of cigarettes. Sound business principles demand an emphatic rejection of this "prize package" offer.

The Picture and the Voice

By W. Stephen Bush

I CANNOT think of a perfect moving picture entertainment without the aid of the human voice. Here is a practical question, deserving the earnest and immediate study of every exhibitor who is anxious to improve the quality of his entertainment. I am not dealing with an experiment or with a theory. Wherever and whenever the human voice has been made an adjunct to an exhibition of moving pictures the result has been a gain in the receipts and a most desirable increase in prestige. Of course, the human voice must be enlisted in a proper and intelligent manner; some thought and care must be devoted to the subject. Whenever this is done I know from an actual experience of several years that it means a sure profit for the exhibitor.

The need of the human voice was felt from the very beginning of the motion picture. It was felt at once that music alone was not sufficient. All sorts of attempts were made to supply the aid of the human voice. The "illustrated song" and the cheap vaudeville owed their existence and their passing popularity to the fact that they varied the cinematographic program to the extent of bringing the human voice into play. All the efforts to produce the sound of the human voice by means of mechanical contrivances were occasioned by this same desire to supply the element of sound to the motion picture entertainment. We know why the "illustrated song" and the cheap vaudeville have failed; we know that the public has passed judgment on both, and no words need be wasted on that phase of the subject. Are the attempts to introduce the human voice by means of synchronizing devices into the motion picture theater likely to be more successful? A more perfect and satisfactory method of synchronization may and probably will be invented in the future, but will this solve the problem? We remember the furore made less than five years ago by the cameraphone, and the vogue which later the so-called "talking pictures" enjoyed. Parts of comic operas and entire acts of vaudeville had been "cameraphoned." People who cannot look below the surface thought that the "talking picture," whether produced by the synchronizer or by the man behind the screen, was going to have a great future. Fabulous sums were asked and great sums were paid for "cameraphone rights" in the cities and States of the country, and "talking-picture companies" were organized and traveled about from place to place. To-day the cameraphone and the "talking picture" are forgotten and discarded, just as the "illustrated song" and the cheap vaudeville, but the need of the human voice in the moving picture program remains and must be supplied.

Slowly but surely the best and most pleasing method of supplying the human voice has progressed in the last five years. There is no doubt that the proper lecture with the right subject has come to stay and that it is the only welcome and feasible method of connecting the motion picture with the human voice. It is not, like the "illustrated song" or the cheap vaudeville, foreign to the motion picture; on the contrary, it grows out of the motion picture and is a part of or a natural addition to the picture itself. It relates directly to the picture. The mechanical reproduction of the voice seeks to create a double illusion; an illusion of the eye and of the ear as well, and spoils both illusions. The lecture, properly selected and handled, delivered by a competent speaker, adds directly to the enjoyment of certain pictures, because we all enjoy just in the degree in which we understand. Who enjoys Italian opera best: the man who can only hear the music or the man who can understand the singers as well as he can hear the orchestra? There are at least three pictures in ten which are difficult to understand without some sort of explanation, and there are even more pictures which are greatly improved and can be enjoyed much better with a lecture. We all can readily understand that the great feature films must be accompanied by lectures, but there are hundreds of pictures, just ordinary releases, which stand fully as much in need of proper running comment while they are traversing the screen. Every exhibitor and most patrons of motion picture theaters realize this fact.

Pick out almost any great dramatic, classic, literary, historic or religious or travel film. Look at it the first time and pay close attention while it is being run. Then look at it again and you will be surprised how much more you can discover in it than on your first witnessing it. This is quite natural. The manufacturer of the picture devoted days, perhaps weeks to it, and no matter how hard he may have tried to make it perfectly plain and simple there are always some points which are brought out more forcibly by an explanation. Now, if a man of fair education and quick wit and some gift of speech will look at a picture and exhaust all its possibilities and then prepare an explanation and deliver it while the picture is in progress, it will seem like a new revelation to the members of an audience in the motion picture theater. The exhibitor who is able to appreciate this fact and to secure a competent lecturer will soon discover this to be fact, both to his pleasure and to his profit. It is, of course, important to select the right kind of pictures. In nine cases out of ten the exhibitor himself is quite able to make the right choice. The rest must be left to the lecturer.

Five years ago lectures on motion pictures, except on big features, were uncommon. To-day there are theaters with regular attendant lecturers in almost every big city and in many of the smaller towns in the country. In Chicago, Boston and Philadelphia the patrons of motion picture theaters are well used to lectures as part of the night's entertainment. To-day there are five lecturers to every two of five years ago. The progress would have been much greater had it not been for the lack of proper material in the field of lecturers. Much as the public enjoy and appreciate a capable man, just as much they reject and resent the other kind. It is the task of the exhibitor to look about him and seek after good material. It is the exhibitor who must agitate the subject of lectures to the utmost of his power, for he will be the gainer thereby. The exhibitor has it in his power to create the necessary demand, and that will surely result in the coming of the necessary supply.

Practical steps toward introducing the moving picture in the schools have been taken by the authorities of Berlin, Germany. For some time past a teacher has been devoting his attention to the subject under instructions from the government. Learning of the government's interest in the matter, two big manufacturers of machines have offered to install a perfect cinematographic apparatus on trial. The government has accepted the offer and both machines have been placed in centrally located schools. Another agent of the government has in the meantime put himself in communication with two film manufacturers who have turned out good educational films in the past.

By Louis Reeves Harrison

An entertainment of growing popularity, so far as our country is concerned, whose value and possibilities have been known for many years in England, is comprised in what is known as "Pageantry." The Pageants are so varied that they include costume processions, cavalcades, decorated floats, outdoor performances in celebration of anniversaries, and indoor presentations of historical scenes by schools and colleges, some of the latter having high artistic and educational quality.

Pageantry is increasing so rapidly in favor among the most intelligent of our people, and the interest to which it appeals is so universal among men, women and children, that it almost constitutes a growing little cloud on the sky of moving picture production and exhibition. It is not only a new form of education which appeals powerfully to the play instinct, but it is attracting the attention of the very people now being trained in the photoplay business, including musicians and actors as well as artists and dramatists.

The process of Pageantry, as well as its aims and general nature, is so delightfully constructive, allowing people to live in the scenes they are depicting or studying, that it has taken as swift and strong a grip on widespread public favor as did moving pictures during the highest wave of their development. Pageants may be given in the open, enjoyed by all participating; the scene may extend as far back as the eye can reach, and they have traditions that go back to the times of Egyptian festivals. They are merely pictured action in the long procession, but they rise in dignity when they represent important historical events or express in dramatic form some of the activities and aspirations of the human mind.

As illustrated in the article entitled "Saved," moving pictures are seriously hampered by too much theatrical effect. As a further illustration, characters are shown in exterior scenes with exactly the same make-up used under the glare of studio lamps. A mountain maid, who should be as brown as a hazelnut, appears with deeply blackened eyes peering forth from a ghastly daub of grease paint while depicting life in the open. Indoors or outdoors, the actors are decked out in the stale old trappings of wardrobe-room absurdity and asked to perform in comedies that are nauseatingly cheap, in a mockery of melodrama that is terribly overstrained, or in those tedious adaptations which may be convenient to the producer but which have to be so smothered in explanatory subtitles that the audience turns cold before the presentation is half through.

I do not suppose that we will be able to turn out moving pictures in this primitive stage of the game without those stock properties, the automobile, the telephone and the revolver, but there is too much frenzied heroism exhibited on the screen to suit any but a small and noisy class in the audience and those ranters who have suddenly come up from the scum and residuum of our population. A man has to rise above low tastes before he can get any breadth of view on this or on any other subject. Mr. M. P. Lowbrow is our old friend, the clam, who does not know that ships sail on the sea.

When stories are told on the screen there is necessarily pictured action, just as there is picturesque action in the processions of pageantry, or in the movement of a train of cars, but the finest effects will come when we not only give broad and sympathetic consideration to the dramatic side of the acted picture, but to each scene as a picture in itself. We must rid the art of what is theatrically superfluous, give living dramas that stand for something, consider the composition of each scene presented, and use that artistic taste which beautifies and glorifies any work intended to make a visual appeal.

The elemental basis of interest to be found in the pageant is its stimulus to the imagination through the eye. This is the aim of any great spectacle and of any great picture. The pageant, however, has no limitations of space—it may be impressive as pictured action alone—but I know of no other form of dramatic presentation in which superfluous motion can be dispensed with to greater advantage than in what we have come to call the "photoplay." See how the painter makes a marvelous appeal with his still picture in small scope! That is what we must study in the acted picture of small scope.

There is a great deal that is wholesome and invigorating in pageantry that may be shown on the screen, but no frenzied heroism and no monotony of action, such as getting on and off trains, going up or down the steps of the house, and that wearisome form of chase in which characters fall over each other and upset the apple-carts should mar the presentation. Pictured action is the most primitive form of moving pictures, and when it is not absolutely necessary to the telling of a screen story it represents just so much film and time thrown away. It often injects a comedy element where none was intended, for it must be remembered that the operator of a projector can make such action very amusing in a strained situation by increasing or slackening speed.

Put yourself in the place of the audience. Consider a mass of people who have come into the theater to get relief from what is stale and tiresome. Sit with them in the rapt silence of the place, in the semi-darkness that forces attention on the lighted screen. Remember that they read and think as much as you do and possibly more. Reason it out for yourself how the working people of factory towns—according to Mary Shaw—came to be the most appreciative patrons of the Ibsen drama. Do not forget that love of the beautiful is as universal as the love of sweet voices and good music.

Present people that we recognize as akin to ourselves in their thoughts and conduct. Show them in some such struggle as all manly men and womanly women are making. Keep in mind that conduct is the key to character and lay bare the hidden purposes of actors in the drama by quiet and subtle methods—their faces are very close to ours—that our minds may enjoy our own discernment, and, for Heaven's sake, give us something to discern. Center your attention upon the characterization, or your story is a mere waste of your time and ours.

The artist who paints a still picture tells the whole story of a character at a glance. Where you are weak is in not giving us an inside view of the characters before they mingle and clash in the acted picture. We in the audience must depend upon elements that are purely pictorial in those whose story you are trying to tell. J. C. Van Dyke says, "A picture is a biographical statement; it is the man and not the facts that awaken our admiration; unless we feel his presence and know his genius the picture is nothing but a collection of incidents." When this becomes fixed in the mind of the producer the future of moving pictures is assured.

"The Starbucks" (American)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade

OPIE READ'S romantic drama, "The Starbucks," has been enacted in pictures for the first time, by one of the American Eastern stock companies. The scenario, which is based on the play, has been written by Omer F. Doud, who is in charge of the American's scenario department. Mr. Doud has displayed fine constructive skill in his treatment of the story, the incidents being well connected and interest sustained with increasing intensity until the climax is reached. The scenes have been selected with nice judgment, and their pictorial representations are marked by excellent studio and out-of-door work. Producer Wm. J. Bauman is to be congratulated on these interior and exterior scenic effects and for his able direction of the acting force.

It required a careful study of the characters and much painstaking rehearsal to present to us correct types of the men and women who lived in the secluded Tennessee region, where the story is placed. Most likely, Mr. Read, who is familiar with these types, and who appears in the impressive role of Jasper Starbuck, rendered valuable aid in determining the manner of their portrayal and in the selection of costumes and properties that contribute atmosphere to the production.

The play made a big hit about fifteen years ago. It had successful runs in the old Daly's Theater, New York, and in the Dearborn Street Theater (now the Garrick), in Chicago. Mr. Read afterwards wrote the book from the drama, and its sales ran over the million mark. Only another work of his, "The Jucklings," had greater popularity.

Opie Read's impersonation of Jasper Starbuck in this fine two-reel American subject will rather astonish many of his friends, who had not even dreamt of his possessing latent histrionic talent. They have known him, and remember him delightfully, as novelist, playwright, newspaper man and lecturer; now to discover that he has scored a distinctive hit in the leading part of a strong photoplay will arouse all the pleasing emotions called forth by a valuable find. No man knows better than he the inner working of the mind of Jasper Starbuck or the outward manifestations of such working. We can therefore accept Mr. Read's impersonation not only as the nearest but also as the truest yet given of the stalwart old mountaineer.

The big frame, the strong features, the easy, quiet poses of the old man are all there. We enjoy his whimsical, purling humor when his good wife is made the object of his genial shafts, and we fear the outbreak of the smouldering volcano in his breast when Lije Peters is around. His goodness of heart, as shown by his protection of the weak, affects us strangely when we remember the lightning swiftness of his vengeance. And the pride of his race and the conscious innocence of wrong fill us with admiration as he stands before the United States Judge, in chambers, at Nashville. The ferocity of his nature, when aroused, is revealed only once. That is when he confronts Lije Peters in the Judge's chambers and nearly chokes him to death. It is a thrilling scene, and Mr. Read has realized all its possibilities without going beyond them.

The Lije Peters of C. M. Devere is a powerful characterization. The make-up alone is sufficient to stamp him a villain; but supplemented by Mr. Devere's forceful acting, the villain becomes a devil. The brutal face, the cruel snarl of the lips, the ruffianly courage and the persistent deviltry of the man are all caught in the pictures.

Another strong characterization is given by William Lee, in the role of Jim Starbuck. In this figure is concentrated the comedy of the drama as revealed in pictures. In the play, the "lazy niggah," Kintchin, was a droll, amusing character; but in the photoplay it is impossible to bring out the pith of the humor. Mr. Lee in dress, gait, mannerisms and action gives a quaint and amusing depiction of the gawky young mountain preacher.

Lou Starbuck has an excellent double in Miss Logan; Mrs. C. R. Smith gives fine character shading to the part of Mrs. Jasper Starbuck; Eugene Bonner is impressive and dignified as Judge Elliot; Tom Elliot is capably sustained by William Morse, and Miss Maynon Steward takes the role of Mrs. Mayfield acceptably.

The camera, photographic and technical work are in full keeping with the uniform merit of the production.

CHIEF CHARACTERS IN THE CAST

Jasper Starbuck.....Opie Read
Mrs. Jasper Starbuck.....Mrs. C. R. Smith
Lou Starbuck, their daughter.....Miss Logan
Jim Starbuck, their nephew.....Wm. Lee
Judge Elliot.....Eugene Bonner
Tom Elliot, son of Judge Elliot.....Wm. Morse
Mrs. Mayfield, sister of Judge Elliot..Maynon Steward
Lije Peters.....C. M. Devere

Mrs. Mayfield, sister of Judge Elliot, of Nashville, dispirited over the dissolution of an unfortunate marriage, sits moodily in the Elliot home and broods. Judge Elliot, one-armed and a stern old veteran, finds it impossible to control her.

The Judge's son, Tom, intensely fond of his aunt, suggests that they go forth in search of adventure into the Tennessee mountains. Mrs. Mayfield eagerly seizes the chance of escape from fashionable boredom. Straightway they make arrangements, and a few days later arrive in the heart of the hills and in the midst of a civilization so primeval and natural that Mrs. Mayfield's delight knows no bounds.

They arrive at the home of Jasper Starbuck, a giant mountaineer, whose strong but simple nature, quaint philosophy and fearless courage charm the city folk and furnish a needed balm for the gentle, wounded nature of Mrs. Mayfield.

In the days that follow, Tom and Lou Starbuck, Jasper's daughter, learn to love each other. Jim Starbuck, a country preacher and nephew of Jasper, pays a visit to the Starbucks at this time. Long-legged, awkward and extremely diffident, but possessed of a soul that revels in the beauties of Nature, and also possessing a quaint backwoods eloquence and dauntless physical courage, Jim Starbuck appeals strongly to the imagination of Mrs. Mayfield. They are thrown much together, and love comes before either realizes it. Only big Jasper Starbuck, with his keen eye and whimsical humor, discovers the secrets of both couples.

Adjoining the Starbuck property is the home of Lije Peters, a bully but not a coward. He is also passionate, unscrupulous and murderous in his likes and dislikes. He loves Lou Starbuck, but the girl spurns him, and his smouldering anger quickens into revengeful hate.

Near the Starbuck home, old Jasper has made moonshine whisky without a Government license, just as his father and grandfather had done before him, and just as many of the residents in the neighborhood did. It was no secret, and the United States officers had long ceased to penetrate the deadly hills for offenders. Eager for revenge on the Starbucks, Lije Peters applies for the position of Deputy United States Marshal. In the meantime he makes many trips to the Starbuck home, and threatens old Jasper, demanding the hand of his daughter and loans of money.

One day Lije's appointment came. Soon afterward he and two deputy marshals from Nashville wreck the Starbuck still. Jasper Starbuck, who had many notches to his credit on the stock of his Winchester, oils that weapon and goes out after his enemies. Twice he had a bead on them and twice he lowers his rifle, remembering that his daughter Lou is now the wife of Tom Elliot and that his nephew Jim has married Mrs. Mayfield. He hurls the rifle from him and then goes down to meet the officers. He is taken to the jail at Nashville, where he awaits trial with all the fortitude he can summon.

Tom Elliot had telegraphed his father acquainting him with his own marriage and that of his aunt, but failed to give the maiden name of his wife. In reply, Judge Elliot writes his son a good-natured letter of congratulation. Incidentally he mentions that he is about to try an old soldier named Starbuck for moonshining, and that the prospect was anything but pleasant. The news brought the honeymoon couples post haste to Nashville. Mrs. Jasper Starbuck, who had become lonesome in her mountain home, also came to the prison to see her husband at this time.

Out of respect for Jasper Starbuck, as a veteran, Judge Elliot decides to try the case in his chambers and not before a jury. The old soldier's plea is so eloquent that the Judge pardons him. At this moment Tom and Lou and Mrs. Mayfield and Mrs. Starbuck arrive on the scene. The Judge learns for the first time that Jasper Starbuck is the father of his son's wife, and inquires why the old soldier had not acquainted him with the fact.

"Jedge," he replied, "it would have looked like I was a-cringin'. I know how to bleed for my country, but I don't know how to beg for myse'f."

"The Starbucks" will be released on Saturday, November 9th. It will be treated as a regular release and not as a special.

SCREEN CLUB NOTES.

The charter of the Screen Club has been received during the past week.

Carpenters, decorators and plumbers are at work on the new clubhouse, in West Forty-Fifth Street near Broadway. It is expected that the new home of the film men will be ready for occupancy within the next thirty days.

J. V. Ritchey, of the Carlton Motion Picture Company, this week mailed to Secretary Calder Johnstone his check for life membership.

The next meeting of the club will be held at Bryant Hall, Sixth Avenue, just south of Forty-Second Street, on Saturday evening, October 26, at 8:30 o'clock. At this time the final payment on initiation fee and the dues for the first six months will be collectible.

The board of governors are holding weekly meetings, much of the time being devoted to matters connected with the new quarters.

"Silent Jim" (Eclair).

By G. F. Blaisdell.

RED BLOOD bounds through and abounds in this story. It is a tale of the Great Northwest and of the equally great Northwest Mounted Police. This wonderful constabulary has been the theme of many strong stories—for the pages of fiction and for the screen. Well it may have been. It has had a history which has been the pride of the English-speaking race. Policing thousands of square miles of wild country, the troopers have stood as the symbol of that civilization at the edges of the great country which through these widely scattered human instruments imposed the law of the British Empire upon white man and red man.

"Silent Jim" is portrayed by Alec Francis. This splendid actor finds here a real opportunity to display his talent. We who have followed him—in the Eclair company and before that in Vitagraph stock—know that he has ability of high order. Perhaps in no picture in which he has appeared has this been more plainly apparent. Adding to the attractiveness and effectiveness of his work is the fine support assigned him.

Miss Barbara Tennant is always charming. She is one of the fortunate few screen artists who, blessed with her full share of fair face and supple figure, joins to these most desirable endowments real ability in character portrayal. As Jacqueline she has the role of a backwoods coquette, pleased alike with the attentions of the polished spendthrift son of an English family and the handsome, smiling Baptiste, the half-breed trapper, who showers her with presents of rich fur. But when the test comes she is a real woman. Besides these, there is the sergeant of the mounted police—a rugged figure, topped with strong face. Mr. Johnstone is peculiarly fitted for the portrayal of the sergeant. He brings to the film an experience gained as a member of one of Uncle Sam's crack cavalry troops. Mr. Frazer plays Baptiste. The work of the entire company is uniform—convincing; the illusion is present from the start.

Just a word as to the settings. With a few exceptions, "Silent Jim" is a story of outdoors—of forest and crag and mire. The exceptions are the interior of the trading post and the home of Jacqueline. The photography is excellent. As to situations, the resumé of the story will show that there are tense moments, but the action is rapid—snappy, speedy.

"Silent Jim" was a trapper of the Northwest. Periodically he sought out a trading post, that he might exchange his furs for supplies. He never talked. On one of these visits the men sitting about the post chaffed him on his silence. He had refused liquor. Suddenly the trapper faced the men around the long wooden tables—police, trappers and idlers. "I came here from England to become a man," he told his hearers. "I, too, wore the uniform; they said I disgraced it—then took it away. I lost it because I loved a girl—and I love her still."

The scene dissolves. Jim is shown as a young man in the garb of the city. He meets Jacqueline and falls in love. There is a rival, a handsome half-breed, with a winning smile and a "way with the women." Baptiste brings to Jacqueline presents of handsome furs. There is no misunderstanding between the men; there is a very definite understanding. Jim receives his appointment to the Mounted and is congratulated by his friends. Scarcely has he received his equipment than he is ordered to bring in a murderer. He has seen two men struggling on a cliff. He finds the body of one at the base. Also he catches a glimpse of a fugitive. It is Baptiste. Jim follows the half-breed, right to the cabin of Jacqueline. The mounted man wastes no words. He takes Jacqueline from in front of a closet door and shoots through it. He pulls back the door. His quarry is not there. Baptiste has escaped as the door was opened. The closet had no wall on one side. Jim goes in pursuit. He is lured to quicksands, in which he sinks to his waist. Baptiste comes back to him and taunts him and invites him to shoot. Jim throws his pistol at him. Baptiste picks up the weapon and leaves Jim to his fate.

Night falls. Jacqueline is asleep. The rays of the moon strike through the window and fall on her face. Baptiste has worried over the mounted man caught in the mire and determines to save him. With the aid of a pole he pulls the now unconscious Jim from the water, puts him on his back and starts for the cabin of Jacqueline. In the meantime the troopers have received instructions to bring in Baptiste, dead or alive, the daughter of the half-breed's Indian victim having brought in word of her father's murder. Baptiste takes Jim to the girl's cabin. Jacqueline is aroused and Jim is thrown on the bed under the window. Baptiste hears the approach of the troops and steps out. As he is making his escape he is discovered by the sergeant. The officer follows and is just about to shoot the fugitive, when Jacqueline picks up a gun and rushes to the window. Jim is now conscious and sits up. He sees the girl taking aim at his sergeant. He sees the sergeant aiming at the man who had drawn him from the mire. Jim takes the weapon from the girl. As the sergeant raises his pistol his arm drops. He has been shot in the hand. Other officers rush into the house. The rifle is in Jim's hand. The sergeant enters wounded. Jim is stripped of his equipment.

Baptiste escapes. He returns for Jacqueline. Jim finds her ready to depart; he knows with whom she is going. There is a strong scene as the unsuccessful rival takes Jacqueline in his arms and kisses her. The girl is in doubt She does not resist. It is love for one, pity for the other who saved "the" one—saved him for her. There is a twilight picture on a rocky summit. By the side of a campfire the outlaw stands with the girl he has won.

The scene dissolves. "That's my story, boys," says Jim, simply. A gray-mustached trooper goes over to him and shows him a scar on his hand. It is the sergeant. They shake hands. Quietly Jim takes up his gun and departs. The eyes of all follow him. As we bid good-bye to Jim he is kneeling on a hillside. He reaches into his kit and draws out a bit of hair-ribbon—a relic he had found in Jacqueline's deserted cabin—which he had preserved for twenty years.

COMING KLEINE FILM RELEASES.

An excellent historical production, a thrilling drama, and an interesting three-subject reel containing two industrials and a travelogue will be released by George Kleine this coming week.

For Tuesday "Mosques and Turkish Palaces in Northern Africa" spreads before us many beautiful edifices of the Church and palatial homes of the nobility in the cities of Northern Africa. After seeing these gorgeous buildings with their marvelous inlaid walls we are strongly impressed with the beauty of the architecture of that region. "Straw Hats Made in Florence, Italy," shows the entire process—the selecting of the straw, plaiting of the straw by hand or machine, drying the hats, shaping and ironing, and, indeed, every step up to the final finishing.

To complete the reel, another industrial entitled "Venetian Lace Workers" will be especially interesting to the women in the audiences. We are shown close views of the lace under the deft fingers of the expert workers. It is a most interesting film throughout.

For Wednesday the Eclipse offering, "A Race for Honor," describes in a highly dramatic manner how a courageous girl saves the reputation of her father and sweetheart which the former so thoughtlessly risked, from a terrible disgrace. Her presence of mind and forethought, when a quick decision is absolutely necessary, and her fearlessness when duty demands that she make the perilous ride in the motor car, stamp her as a true heroine. The race between the fugitive and pursuing car is certainly a "thriller" and holds one breathless to the very end. This release will prove a credit to any program.

"A Head for a Head" is the Saturday Cines. Laid in the days of the French Revolution, the film certainly reflects the horrors and terrors of that awful period in history. The story deals with the experiences of Vigot, a poor gardener's son, who becomes an ardent follower of the great leader of the revolutionary party, Robespierre. On account of his untiring devotion and tremendous energy in the cause of the "terrorists," Vigot becomes a prominent leader of the revolutionary party. But as so many of those peasants did when endowed with great power, he wreaks a frightful vengeance upon the aristocrats who despised and abused him in former days. However, another side of his character is shown; he loves the daughter of his former employer, a proud nobleman who has just been guillotined, and later, when she herself is thrown into prison to await a similar fate, the devoted fellow obtains her release by bribery. But the matter is soon brought to the ears of Robespierre, who signs Vigot's death warrant. Even his former deeds and zeal in behalf of the new government cannot save him; his head must be taken in place of hers. The principal roles are very well taken throughout and this fact, together with the great scenes showing crowds of people in the characteristic costumes of the day, render a film deserving of the highest praise as a historical production.

"The Debt" (Rex)

By G. F. Blaisdell.

THIS is a strong story. More than that, it is strongly acted. It is a story abounding in dramatic situations. The interest is established in the initial scenes, and it holds all the way through the two reels. Adding to the realism of one part of the picture is a view of a train wreck. Producer Vail has builded well; he also has been fortunate in the men and women who composed the cast.

It must be said, frankly, that "The Debt" is a picture for adult audiences. The young children will not comprehend it; to them its significance will be lost. Older children, perhaps, should not see it. It is a matter for each exhibitor, knowing his clientele, to determine for himself. Very likely also the drama, virile as it is, will have to be guardedly handled below Mason and Dixon's line. There is a racial as well as a moral situation.

Jack Warren, the son of well-to-do parents, has been carrying on a flirtation—and a flirtation which cannot be described as of the harmless sort—with Zema, an octoroon in the employ of his parents. As the story opens, Zema is begging Jack to do that which the ordinary conventions of society demand a man shall do when he has won the affections of a woman—fulfill his obligations—take her to the altar. Zema is on her knees. There is no question as to her love for Jack. But her lover has no intention of publicly acknowledging the love he has so ardently if privately professed. He spurns the woman at his feet. In the first place, actually he is in love with Beatrice Blake, with whom also his brother Paul is in love. Jack goes straight to

Scene from "The Debt" (Rex).

Beatrice. Zema watches the two as they stroll out into the fields. She sees Jack kiss Beatrice. She realizes then the full significance of the disaster—of the tragedy—that has come into her life.

Paul also has been a close follower of the action of Jack and Beatrice. He goes the way of the wanderer—and he goes a long way from home, off by himself. Zema has not given up hope of winning Jack. In an appeal to him, she exclaims, "God Almighty never intended one law for the white and one for the black." She throws to the ground the money Jack offers her.

Zema has a brother, Jim. His brotherly eye has noted the distress of Zema. He has also wondered at the sudden departure of Paul. He jumps at conclusions. Zema, anxious to shield Jack, tells her brother that Paul is the one guilty. There is a distressing scene. The brother has no knowledge of Paul's whereabouts. In three months, however, Jim sees Paul enter his home, having been summoned back on account of the illness of his mother. He follows him. Zema is watching the two. Now she is in terror that her brother may do harm to Paul before she can tell him of Paul's innocence. Zema enters the house, Paul, coming into the same room, discovers Zema kissing Jack's photograph. "Jack promised to marry me," she explains to Paul. Zema's brother, Jim, entering the window from the piazza, draws a pistol. Zema grapples with him, secures the pistol and throws it through the window. In self-abnegation Paul assumes his brother's guilt.

A little later, as Paul is by the window, a note is passed through by an unseen hand. It is from Zema. She tells him she is going away—she cannot bear to have him sacrifice himself for his brother's debt. The following scene shows Zema going "into the night and nowhere," a slight figure silhouetted against a sky from which the sun is sinking.

A year later, Paul at his cabin in the woods sees Zema, faint and weary, approaching with a babe in her arms. A dissolving scene shows Jack and Beatrice, happy; there is a baby here also. The flash fades. Paul goes to the aid of Zema. It is a dramatic situation. Toil and trouble have done their work. Zema is buried near the cabin. Paul picks up little Minna, caresses her, closes up his cabin and starts further west.

Twenty years later Minna starts east to study music. Paul puts her on the train and kisses her good-bye. On the train Minna is seated in front of a young man who immediately shows his interest in her in the ways so well known to travelers. He hands her his card. "Bert Warren" is the name it bears. "Why," says Minna "my name is Warren, too." Their conversation terminates abruptly. They are both thrown to the floor. There has been an accident. We see the cars overturned, the locomotive, broken up, on its side. Bert is dragging Minna through a window of a burning car.

Back in the West Paul receives a letter from Minna telling him that she is desperately in love, adding: "We are going to be married. Isn't it strange? His name is just like ours, Warren; and he has an uncle named Paul." The two are on their way to Bert's home. Paul goes out of the house and mounts a horse in haste. He goes to the telegraph office and sends a message.

At Jack's home all is in readiness for a wedding ceremony. The clergyman has arrived. Beatrice is happy in her son's happiness. As the ceremony is about to begin Jack is handed a telegram. He reads it and collapses. "Stop wedding," it says, "Minna is the daughter of yourself. She is Bert's sister. Am coming." It is signed Paul. To the distressed inquiries of Beatrice, of Bert and of Minna, the broken father, whose sin has found him out after all these years, can only say: "She is my child." Beatrice puts her arms about Minna and leads her away.

Bert upbraids his father. Jack reaches in a drawer, takes out a pistol and goes into an adjoining room. Bert keeps a hand on the knob, but he makes no move to prevent what only too plainly is going to happen. Paul rushes into the room as the pistol is fired. Minna goes out into the night. She, also, is paying the debt. In the window, in the light reflected from the moon, stand mother and son. The son puts his hand in his mother's.

A month later Minna has reached the grave of her mother, out in the forest. We leave her, standing as did her mother many years before, outlined against the sky—and doomed to follow her mother's weary footsteps.

"Gar El Hama"

Three-Reel Great Northern Release.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS is the story of a daring criminal. It is not a record of his crimes, but a glimpse of his marvelous activities in escaping pursuit after a large reward has been offered for his apprehension. Gar el Hama belongs to the essentially egotistical group of those who live for themselves alone and in opposition to organized society. Such men are not always criminals—they may rise high in business or politics—but their desires and motives are primitive enough to center on "self" as a creature existing wholly apart from all others.

Self-motives actuate all individuals of the male sex; they are the mainspring of effort; but they are more acutely conscious among the unthinking, being modified by training and worldly experience and under complete subjection the moment a man realizes that he must be of use to his fellows in the finest sort of way to command their interest and respect. Gar el Hama is a true type. He is only impelled by elementary instincts. For him life is competition between man and man, with all advantage on the side of the crook if he can keep out of jail. One reason that such a character is of interest to us is that the moral and intellectual development which has made us segregate those who expect to survive by acts of violence has not wholly eliminated their instincts from us. On this account we often feel a sneaking sympathy for the fellow we know to be in the wrong.

Scene from "Gar el Hama" (Great Northern).

Sympathy is enlisted for Gar el Hama at the outset by his very helplessness. He is lying unconscious in a field, not far from a railroad track. He is noticed by some workmen riding on a handcar and they stop from those kindly motives which play no part in the makeup of outcasts. They carry him on their car to a crossing where there is a workman's cottage and make an effort to revive him. The cottager goes on his bicycle for Doctor Watson, an intelligent young practitioner, and the latter visits the scene in his motor car. Motion, motion, motion.

The story begins when Watson recognizes in his patient the noted criminal, Gar el Hama, for whom the police are searching. In proof, Watson shows the cottager a newspaper in which a picture and description of the very man lying unconscious in the house. The doctor goes to inform the police and the cottager takes the paper to his wife—being a married man, he must tell her all about it—and their indiscreet conversation is overheard by the patient. Gar has recovered consciousness during the medical examination, but has been cunning enough to sham until he learns whether or not he has been identified. He overhears the communicative cottager and lays a plan of action.

It is now hammer and anvil between Watson and Gar el Hama. The latter asks the cottager to bring him a glass of water. He thus gets the man within reach. He rises suddenly from the couch and overpowers the teller of secrets and ties him securely. He then runs out to where the handcar is standing and compels one of the workmen at the pistol's point to drive it at full speed. Watson rouses the police and they secure the use of a locomotive. In the chase that follows are some of the best pictures of the kind ever shown.

We are given a very even view of the handcar in motion, the pictures being taken from a car preceding it at the same speed, and the dramatic action is enhanced by this near view of the criminal under exciting circumstances. All the fear and hate in his composition are shown under very unusual conditions. The acting of the man who assumes the title role is magnificent at times, especially when it is a matter of life and death for him to escape.

In the pursuit we are given a still more interesting view of the track from an entirely new point of observation. We are looking through the cab window of the locomotive with the engineer; we can see far ahead on the curves—the criminal is there—and the pursuit begins to have a sense of peril for us when it is discovered that on this single track there is a train coming the other way. Between the engine of the police and Doctor Watson and a far-distant train dashing forward to collision is the criminal on the handcar. He makes a flying leap from it, as he had already done from a train when found lying unconscious in the field, but lands safely and disappears. The engines are brought to a standstill in time to prevent a head-on collision, with the hand-car between them and the police discomfited.

We now follow the criminal through a most extraordinary series of solitary adventures. He completely disguises himself and finds his way to wharves. He slips into some moored boats like a river rat. He pulls these by main strength to what appears to be a sewer opening and enters it with as much confidence as a gentleman would the rear door of his mansion. It is the rear entrance of his mansion. There is a trapdoor from the sewer to a pipe-room, a chamber filled with water mains and other conduits. From this pipe-room he ascends to a secret door in his own house and enters a dark chamber completely equipped with a theatrical wardrobe, almost enough to start a moving picture business.

The arch criminal completely divests himself of one personality and assumes a character that is in startling contrast to his natural one. It seems that he leads a Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde sort of an existence. Converted to an eminently respectable and benevolent-looking gentleman he reassumes his social place as the president of a society for the prevention of crime. In this role he is visited by Doctor Watson in relation to a threatening letter received from the notorious Gar el Hama. Watson gives up the letter and is about to depart when he is pushed through one of the many secret contraptions of the place and thrown into the pipe-room. He manages to find the trap door, but it lets in a flood of water—the tide has risen—and the doctor is nearly drowned.

His wife goes in search of him and, having more sense than the police, directs their suspicions to the unsuspected president of the crime-prevention society. It is through her that the villain is finally trapped, but while this is going on we are kept in dire suspense about the fate of brave Doctor Watson. Every now and then we are given glimpses of him struggling in the pipe chamber, the water rising higher and higher each time, till we wonder how in the world he is to escape. After all of our anxiety on his account, it is a very simple matter—he swims out. Friendly hands bear him to where his plucky little wife is directing the arrest of the highly accomplished villain. The doctor and his wife embrace, and we think it is all over, but it is not. Gar el Hama has another picturesque and interesting adventure on his way to prison, effecting another marvelous escape, but he is finally captured and the play has a consistent and artistic ending. It is a thriller.

"A Head for a Head."

A Thrilling Cines Historical Drama Released November 2nd, by George Kleine.

This story is laid in the days of the French revolution, that terrible period in history known as the "reign of terror" when oppression, poverty and injustice drove the people of France to rise up in rebellion, to seize the government and when they had the power in their own hands to wreak such a terrible vengeance upon the aristocracy who had ruled them so mercilessly. In this tide of popular uprising, men lost their reason, they became beasts and wildly shouted for blood, the blood of their former oppressors.

The Cines Company has put out a number of subjects of this French revolutionary period, "Madame Roland," "Josephine," and others which depict the life in those dread times most realistically. The costuming of the characters, the settings, backgrounds and acting in the productions are worthy of the highest praise.

"A Head For A Head" deals with the experiences of Armond Vigot, a humble gardener in the employ of the rich Marquis Besler. The fellow is madly in love with Beatrice, the daughter of his proud master, and seeks every opportunity to be near her. When she walks in the beautiful gardens he follows her at a respectful distance, but at the same time he sees no incongruity in the idea of the Marquis' daughter marrying a humble gardener. "Is he, a democrat, not the equal of anyone and has he not a perfect right to marry even a member of the aristocracy if he so desires?"

One day Vigot discovers Beatrice asleep on the parapet encircling the lagoon in the garden, and sinking upon his knees, takes her hand and fervently kisses it. At this, Beatrice awakes and seeing Vigot at her feet and realizing what he has done is filled with indignation and rushes off to her father to tell him of the insult that has been offered. Her father and brother immediately go in search of Vigot and after angrily reprimanding him for his audacity, discharge him from the estate. Vigot defends his actions protesting that he is as good as Beatrice and meant no offense, but he is forced to leave, vowing vengeance upon these aristocrats for their mistreatment.

Vigot journeys to Paris, where he soon becomes one of the most violent of the revolutionists and is extremely active in dealing frightful venegeance upon all aristocrats. He becomes the right hand man of Robespierre and the two are known to their followers as the Tiger and the Hyena on account of their terrible ferocity. Vigot receives information as to his old employer's whereabouts, and remembering the former insult, soon brings an indictment against him, with the result that the Marquis is arrested and cast into prison.

At the trial Vigot strongly supports the accusation and the Marquis is condemned to the guillotine. A few days later the prisoner with other victims of Robespierre's tyranny, is carried through the crowded streets amid the execrations of the populace to the guillotine. As it happens Beatrice recognizes her father in the fatal cart and unfortunately her screams are heard by the crowd, who demand that she also be placed under arrest.

At the trial she is identified as an aristocrat and is condemned to death in spite of the vigorous defense of Vigot, who uses all his influence to save her from the awful fate, but in vain: she is carried back to prison to await her execution. Then commences a terrible struggle in Vigot's mind; shall he sacrifice all his great power and ambitions upon the altar of love, and rescue Beatrice, or permit her to meet her fate.

In the end, love conquers and Vigot determines to use all his influence in securing the escape of the object of his affections. By bribery he attains his purpose and Beatrice is once more free. She is full of gratitude to her humble admirer, but cannot love him and the two part never to meet again. The discovery of Beatrice's escape and Vigot's treachery soon become known. He is summoned before Robespierre and there confesses what he has done. The officers are called in and Vigot is carried to the place of execution, where he meets his doom for the sake of the one he loves better than life.

Hunting the Game of a Large City.

Three Reel Kinograph Feature.

By G. r. Blaisdell.

THERE is a new film man in town. He is Fred Henius, formerly of Pittsburgh. For the past ten years Mr. Henius has been known in the Smoky City as a technical photographer. In that time he has handled with marked success many large contracts in industrial and commercial photography—advertising large projects has been his specialty, among these being a three-reel subject for one of the great electrical companies and a three-reel review for one of the large steel companies. In the course of his work he has had much experience in what is tantamount to stage settings—the designing of model salesrooms, drawing rooms, kitchens, workrooms—in fact, presenting by means of the camera the best and strongest features of a given subject. In this work naturally one of the greatest difficulties has been the artificial lighting of interiors so as to bring superior results. As much of his work has been with the motion picture camera Mr. Henius has acquired a knowledge of the film game that has sharpened his interest in motion pictures of the public variety.

This summer Mr. Henius took a two months' vacation and visited for the first time in fifteen years his native city, Copenhagen. In the course of his stay he met socially the heads of the Kinograph Company of Copenhagen. He was urged to visit their plant and accepted the invitation. Mr. Henius was enthusiastic over the high quality of the photography and the good judgment and skill displayed in the settings and also in the ability shown by the artists—Mr. Henius has been a close follower of the stage. When the suggestion was made to him that he accept the American agency he agreed without hesitation. On his return Mr. Henius organized the Kinograph Company of America, of which he is the president and general manager. His associates are substantial Pittsburghers.

The Kinograph Company of Copenhagen maintains no stock company. The players who interpret Kinograph subjects—and only two and three reel features will be produced—are selected with great care from the leading theaters of Copenhagen. It is intended for the present to market two reels a month. The first film of the Kinograph Company to reach the United States is "Hunting the Game of a Large City," which is being shown to prospective State-right buyers at Mr. Henius' offices in 145 West Forty-fifth Street, where he has installed the latest model Simplex projector. The picture easily bears out Mr. Henius' preliminary statement as to the grade of the photography and the high technique. It is strong also from a dramatic standpoint, especially in the third "act," as the sub-title so aptly describes it. The film will be released the latter part of November.

The story is written and staged by Einar Zangenberg, who also plays the principal part. It is a tale touching two grades of society—the well-to-do and the less fortunate. Perhaps the more notable characteristic of the film is its action—sharp, quick. There is literally something doing every minute. The escape of the thief in the third act, where he utilizes the telephone wires running from one house to another, climbing over and on them, is something new in motion pictures, and is as thrilling as it is novel. The capture of the thief on the great cantilever bridge as it swings wide of its moorings, the culprit breaking away from his captors a moment later and plunging into the stream, is another sensational incident. In fact, there are many points in the action of this picture which sets up in an observer's mind a comparison with the work of one of the most famous American producers.

The story opens in a broker's office. The broker is in financial straits. Mr. Kaer, a trustee of an estate, about to start on a journey, enters and borrows from the broker $2,000, leaving as security papers greatly exceeding in value the amount of the loan. The broker in turn hypothecates the securities with a usurer, the bonds to be returned only on presentation of the receipt. The broker takes the money and goes to visit his friend, Ann, a woman as unscrupulous as she is handsome, with whom he is in love. Ann is entertaining at the time one of her friends, also of questionable character. Handsome Charles retires. The broker is affectionately greeted. Ann tells him her creditors are pressing her. The broker takes out his pocketbook and gives her several notes.

Charles goes to the Doll's House, a saloon of unpretentious type. There he meets his companion, the Corkscrew, a big man with strong face. Charles reads in a newspaper that he is suspected of burglary. He tells the saloonkeeper. The barmaid overhears the talk and goes to inform the police.

The broker bids Ann goodbye and starts home. On the way he is taken ill. The Corkscrew, who has left the Doll's House, helps the broker into the saloon. When the broker is revived he discovers the loss of his pocketbook. Charles had just left the Doll's House, the saloonkeeper having given him money to escape. On his way to the railroad station he finds the purse. He goes straight to Ann's home and shows her his find. She recognizes it and demands that he return it to the owner. She looks at the papers, sees the usurer's receipt, and realizes the contents are of greater value than is represented by the banknotes.

The police already are on the hunt for the missing pocketbook. A detective in disguise goes to the home of the Corkscrew. That wily person penetrates the make-up of the representative of the law and pulls from his chin the false whiskers. He invites the detective to depart. The officer pretends to do so, but instead goes to the floor above, takes from his pocket an auger and starts to bore through the floor. The Corkscrew, who has been joined by Charles, hears him and runs upstairs. Charles escapes. The detective climbs through the skylight, lets himself through a window on the floor below, and also escapes to the street.

At the close of business in the office of the broker that distressed individual receives a note from Mr. Kaer announcing his return and stating that he will call for his securities that evening. When the broker is at his wits' end Charles enters and returns the pocketbook. The broker, telling Charles there can be no question as to the honesty of a man who would return that amount of money, asks him if he will go to the usurer's and bring back some papers. Charles agrees and the broker writes a bogus draft.

In the home of the usurer there is a pretty domestic scene. The daughter is sitting by the side of the money lender, whose face has lost its habitual aspect of cupidity and assumed a benevolent look. As Charles comes the two go to the office. The usurer throws back the door of the safe. Charles sees the banknotes inside, but he dares not touch them. The money lender takes out a bundle of notes and papers. The securities are among them. As the old usurer turns to put back in the safe the papers unconnected with the transaction he slips on the floor, his head strikes the door of the safe and he falls, unconscious. Charles tries to open the safe, but the money lender in falling has closed and locked it. The thief gathers all the papers in sight, including the forged draft, and goes to the home of the Corkscrew and then to the broker's office. There Charles is given money and hurriedly departs. Mr. Kaer calls for his securities and gets them.

The Corkscrew agrees with Charles that he must immediately get out of the city, the usurer never having recovered consciousness. He disguises the thief with a false beard. With the money the broker has given him new clothes are purchased by Charles. The thief enters the railroad station, but the train gates are shut in his face. The detective standing close by has recognized him. Charles goes to visit Ann. He is joined by the Corkscrew. The detective follows the pair. They find the broker in Ann's home.

The detective, as have many plain-clothes men, has friends in the same grade of society as contains those he most frequently hunts. He visits a woman friend and she displays an invitation to attend a party Ann is to hold that evening. He is asked to go as escort and consents. He arranges with policemen to enter the house on signal. In the home of Ann there is revelry. At the order of the plain-clothes man the police enter. The Corkscrew turns out the lights and his great bulk bars the door. Charles escapes. He is followed to the roof by a policeman. Through the skylight Charles climbs to the apex of the roof. There are telephone wires strung to the next house. Over these the fugitive climbs, slipping from one to another and looking every moment as if he would fall to the ground. He reaches the next house while the policeman looks on, helpless. He enters the window and goes to the street. There he finds his way barred by other policemen. He returns to the roof, crawls again through a skylight, lets himself to the edge of the roof and jumps into the stream.

The police pursue in a rowboat. Charles swims to the shore and runs along the waterfront. He reaches the great cantilever bridge just as it swings free from its moorings. The police jump and just make the rapidly moving structure. They get their hands on their quarry for a moment, but he breaks away and jumps into the water. Charles reaches the landing platform, but his weakness overcomes him. The police find him face down in the water, unconscious. As he is dragged ashore Ann rushes to the landing place, but to her entreaties there is no response from the fugitive. His account with the law has been settled.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

ENTHUSIASTIC TEXAS CONVENTION.

Exhibitors of the Lone Star State Organize League, Elect Officers and Select Houston for Next Convention.

MORE than one hundred motion picture exhibitors from nearly every city in the state gathered at Dallas, Texas, on October 15 and 16, and participated in one of the most enthusiastic state conventions of exhibitors that has been held in some time. Interest in the convention was increased by the presence of President M. A. Neff, of the National League and the state league of Texas was organized with a whoop.

Meetings were held in the hall of the Dallas Chamber of Commerce, the first session being called at 2 o'clock Tuesday. It was an open session and President Neff addressed the exhibitors assembled upon the importance of organization, telling them what had already been accomplished by the National and State Leagues now in existence. When Mr. Neff concluded the convention adjourned until 1:30 o'clock Wednesday afternoon. Immediately after the adjournment Gaumont and Universal cameramen took motion pictures of the exhibitors.

In the evening at the Oriental Hotel there was a banquet given which was attended by almost all of the exhibitors, and this was a great success. There were talks made by Messrs. Morris Wolf of Houston, Anthony Xydias of Houston, Mr. Fairman of Bryan, Tex., Mr. M. A. Neff, and as a surprise, Miss Martha Russell, leading lady of the Essanay Film Company of Chicago, was called upon to make a short talk—and told the exhibitors how moving pictures are made.

The business session of the league on Wednesday was most enthusiastic, and the election of the coming officers and the selection for the next state meeting was warmly contested. Houston was selected as the place for the 1913 meeting, and the race was between Houston, Ft. Worth, and Beaumont, and was entered into with much spirit by the delegates from these respective cities. However, Houston won it and certainly deserved to win, as they were the bright lights during this convention. They came in a special car, special costumes, and you could not move without seeing or hearing the Houston delegates.

Next was the election of officers. Morris Wolf, of Houston, was elected president; Clyde M. Blanchard, of Beaumont, 1st vice-president; L. J. Locke, El Paso, 2nd vice-president; John C. Penn, of McKinney, treasurer; Moye Wicks, of Houston, secretary; T. P. Finnegan, national vice-president.

After the convention had adjourned, the Houston delegates announced that they would give a banquet to their members in honor of getting the 1913 convention.

Mr. Neff, the president, certainly accomplished wonders during this convention, and it was the decision of everyone who attended that he was the right man for the place.

Too much credit cannot be given Mr. T. P. Finnegan, who had charge of the convention, and who almost single handed made every arrangement. If all the exhibitors in Texas were as alive as Mr. Finnegan, this state would be further advanced than it is at the present time in the moving picture industry. The film exchanges took an active part in the convention and also deserve credit.

Manufacturers represented were the Exhibitors' Advertising Company, of Chicago; the Simplex Moving Picture Machine Company, of New York, and the National Cash Register Company, of Dayton, Ohio.

The following exhibitors were present:

C. M. Crawford, Waco; Dave Goodlett, Georgetown; H. F. Groene, Merkel; G. Birchwald, Winters; E. N. Moorman, Denton; Jno. C. Penn, McKinney; Jim B. Wilson, Sherman; E. S. Little, Denison; Maurice Wolf, Princess; B. J. Parker, Dixie; M. H. Goodman, Isis; Moyo Wicks, Gem-Vaudette, Houston. L. S. Trammell, Paul Burraco, Geo. P. Brown, Jr., Wm. Geibig, J. J. Solan, C. E. Merris, Anthony Xydias, B. W. Billings, J. H. Fisher, Wyndham Robertson, Houston. Philip Rich, Richmond; A. Y. Clayton, Rosenberg; E. J. Lamkin, Greenvalley; Oscar Adwan, Hubbard; Ed Besserer, Austin; G. W. Crawford, Post City; F. A. Mis, Post City; A. Bandy, Litlle Rock, Ark.; G. K. Jorgenson, Galveston, Tex.; W. O. Jorgenson, Dallas; E. E. Belcia, Dallas and East Texas. J. C. Clemmons, Beaumont; Beatrice Fairchild, Sherman; John I. Pithman, Beaumont and Port Arthur; Theo. E. Clemmons, Beaumont; John Morris, Jr., Jacksonville; H. Mulkey, Clarendon; J. N. Byrd, Frost; Clyde N. Blanchette, J. C. Couch, Jr., Beaumont; C. W. Halley, Uvalde; Lon Bacon, Uvalde; M. C. Witcher, Dublin; N. Luis, Wolf City; Nat S. Luis, Farmersville, Tex.; Bob Bryan, Honey Grove; J. L. McKinney, Weatherford; E. O. Kirkland, Weatherford; W. T. Boie, Honey Grove; R. F. Cornes, McKinney; Henry Putz, Dallas; L. J. Locke, El Paso; W. G. Wood, Cleburne; W. A. Fairman, Bryan; D. Orville Reese, Bryan; E. R. Russell, Dixie; G. H. Judin, Cisco; Jno. Cole, Beerville; Jno. Cole, Golind; H. B. Robb, Big Springs; H. B. Robb, Sweetwater; H. A. Shaw, Dallas; Don E. Lewis, Cooper; U. R. Oliver, Dallas; Thos. D. Garner, Corsicana; M. L. Levine, Corsicana; J. M. Duncan, Clarksville; Jas. A. Woodall, Carthage; B. C. Bell, Palestine; O. A. Engelbrecht, Palestine; R. A. Cunningham, Gainesville; R. A. Carter, Dallas; W. F. Cornes, McKinney; Chas. E. Hodkins, Chicago; J. M. Robb, Big Springs; J. D. Shelton, Cameron; E. H. Phillips, Ft. Worth; G. E. Fussell, Eagle Lake; L. V. Fussell, Eagle Lake; W. D. Nevills, Dallas; N. Lewis, Tyler; M. D. Singleton, Dallas; E. C. Robinson, Winnsboro; Chas. Kimball, McKinney.

One of the features of the convention was the publishing of a "Universal Convention Daily" by James B. Kelly, of the Consolidated Film & Supply Company, of Dallas. The "daily" was a pretentious affair chock full of good stuff concerning the meeting and the people who attended it, and must have made a great hit.

CALL FOR PENNSYLVANIA EXHIBITORS' MEETING.

Secretary George H. Roth of the Pennsylvania State League announces that a meeting of exhibitors of that state will be held in Harrisburg, Pa., Monday, Nov. 11, 1912, for the transaction of business of importance. It is the intention to enter at once upon the task of thoroughly organizing the Exhibitors of the State and a large attendance at this meeting is desired.

NEW HAVEN EXHIBITORS BUSY.

Mr. C. K. Kazanjian and F. M. Hill, motion picture theater men of New Haven, Conn., were in New York last week getting points for a constitution and by-laws for the New Haven exhibitors' association, of which they are active members. They announced that Mr. John Gentile, first elected president of the New Haven organization, had resigned and that Mr. Samuel Eskin had been chosen to fill the vacancy.

PRESIDENT NEFF COMING EAST.

It is rumored that President Neff, of the National Exhibitors' League, will visit New York early in November for a trip among the exhibitors in this and the New England states.

MAJESTIC SUIT AGAINST OLD SALES COMPANY.

The Majestic Motion Picture Company is conducting two suits for conspiracy against the Motion Picture Distributing & Sales Company and the individuals and manufacturers who were interested and active therein. In the United States Court the defendants attacked the complaint of the Majestic Company, but the complaint has been sustained by Judge Lacombe. In the suit in the New York Supreme Court, Judge Bishoff has sustained a demurrer to the complaint, which is to that extent a victory for the defendants. The attorneys for the Majestic Company, however, state they will either promptly take an appeal or perhaps procure leave to amend the complaint. This action arose out of the refusal of the Sales Company, about a year ago, to grant the Majestic Company equal privileges with its members.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

IT appears that there still exists among certain exhibitors of moving pictures the tendency to employ unfair and reprehensible means to swell their business. One of the most despicable, because it misleads and disappoints the public, and works loss and hardship to honest competitors, as well as great evil to the manufacturers of films, is the practice of billing, by posters and banners in front of a theater, the titles of film subjects which are not shown on the screen within. This is worse than downright theft, because it is malicious, and works greater injury.

In justice to exhibitors, it is gladly acknowledged that the practice is now rare. The formation of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America has been a great force in stamping out this and other evils, but the men who persist in the practice will find they can be reached and punished by legal procedure, in cases where a city ordinance does not cover the fraud. In Cleveland such an ordinance is in effect, and the exhibitor who is guilty of such an offense is punished by fine or imprisonment or both. It would be well if the M. P. E. L. of America pushed the passage of such an ordinance in cities throughout the country.

During a conversation with George Kleine, after his return from a recent visit to New York, he chanced to mention a case of this kind, in which he is very much concerned at the present time. He kindly gave me the following interview on the subject which, I believe, will be read with interest by exhibitors and manufacturers:

"When passing the Crystal Hall theater building of the Automatic Vaudeville Company on Fourteenth Street, near Broadway, New York, Tuesday, October 15th, I saw a large banner strung across the front announcing 'The Lion Tamer's Revenge.' Displayed above the banner was a large poster showing a sensational lion scene, which did not remotely resemble the genuine film of this title, nor the film on exhibition, and other posters of various exciting designs were spread in front of the building.

"This is our special feature release of October 21st, and as no prints had as yet been delivered in New York, and in no case were they to be exhibited before October 21st, I came to the conclusion that the banner was shown to mislead the public and that our copyrighted film of that title could not possibly be seen in the theater.

"I telephoned my New York attorneys, who told me that they had already received information from two different parties interested in the reward offered for notice of copyright infringements, to the effect that this subject was announced by this theater, and that the film being shown was a Selig animal release of many months ago.

"This brought up the question which has been discussed more or less for some years past, of the use of misleading announcements in posters, which are usually very sensational, and do not illustrate the film that is being shown. The city of Cleveland has already paid attention to this question, and I understand that it imposes a penalty for misleading the public in this manner.

"As a title, either of a book or play, cannot be copyrighted apart from the book or play, under the present construction of the copyright law, this offense will have to be reached under other laws.

"My attorneys expressed the opinion that an action would hold against an exhibitor who displays in front of his theater the title of a moving picture film, but who does not exhibit the genuine film advertised under this title, particularly when the original subject had been well advertised, and when it seems palpable that the intention of the exhibitor is to cause the public to believe that the advertised film is being shown in the theater.

"Laying the foundation for legal action, I have given instructions when next a similar case arises to obtain evidence by making a photograph of the front of the theater, including the posters, and to procure two or more credible witnesses who have seen the misfit film exhibited in the theater that shows the false poster or banner, and who can testify that it is not the original film advertised under that title.

"All right thinking exhibitors and others interested in the business will agree with me that it is not only a fraud upon the public to induce them to enter a theater expecting to see an advertised film, and then to show them something else that does not follow the poster in any way, but that it is also a rank injustice to the maker of the film that is being shown under a false title, as well as the owner of the advertised subject."

Kewanee, Ill., People See Themselves in Pictures.

W. J. West, manager of the Grand and Majestic Theaters, Kewanee, Ill., writes that he has had big success with a film, made under his direction and at his own expense, showing views of his home town.

"I have crowded my theater for four days and have made a handsome profit out of the venture," he writes. The accompanying paragraphs from a Kewanee paper describe the nature of the film and the interest with which the presentation of the pictures was awaited:

"There is almost an entire reel of pictures including the automobile parade, a run of the fire department, march of the G. A. R. Veterans, shop and street scenes, motorcycle races, and our winning football team in action. In addition to this very interesting and amusing picture the management of the theater will put on two more reels making a 50 minute show.

"Many inquiries have been made at the box office of the theater as to when the pictures would be shown. Local interest in the attraction is keen, and for this reason the pictures will be exhibited four days which will give all a chance to witness them."

"When Wilderness Was King."

Selig's great historical, three-reel subject, "When Wilderness Was King," has kept the interest of the older generation in Chicago on keen edge, ever since it was learned that the Selig producing forces were engaged on it. Over a year has been consumed in preparations and, with the exception of a few changes to be made in certain scenes, the negative is completed.

Members of the Chicago Historical Society have been especially interested in the production, and have watched its progress with eager eyes and hearty enthusiasm. The following letter to Wm. N. Selig from O. L. Schmidt, a prominent member of the Society, will convey some idea of the successful accomplishment of the big task undertaken:

"Permit me to thank you for your courtesy in permitting a partial, preliminary demonstration of your moving picture, 'When Wilderness Was King,' at the Chicago Historical Society.

"It was a most wonderful demonstration of the massacre history of Fort Dearborn, remarkable in its truthfulness and instructive to even those who were well versed in the subject. I, of course, know that romantic and taking picture effects must be worked into such a show, but I am still marveling at the faithfulness with which the actual historic data stand forth.

"I am not alone in this opinion but others, better versed than myself in these affairs, were equally impressed. For instance, Colonel Eastman, an old local historian and writer on these subjects, at present at the head of the Statistical Department of the City of Chicago, expressed his admiration to me. I could mention many others. I write this letter so as to express my esteem to you for putting this historical tragedy on the stage in such a manner.

"We may possibly take the liberty of asking for another representation of the drama when completed at the Chicago Historical Society, but the terms of this would be arranged with you. We would then make an endeavor to secure a very representative audience so that in every way we could make a memorable evening of the affair."

Mammoth M. P. Palace For Minneapolis.

I had the pleasure of a call, at The World office, one day last week, by William L. Harris, president of the New England Furniture and Carpet Co., Minneapolis, the largest house furnishing establishment in the Northwest. Mr. Harris was accompanied by Ceceil Bayless Chapman, a leading architect of Minneapolis, and J. M. Loughlin, Chicago representative of the Minneapolis firm.

Mr. Harris informed me that his firm has decided to build a mammoth palace for moving pictures, on property of the firm bounded by 7th and 8th Streets and First and Second Avenues, in the home city. The block is 330 feet square, but only one-half of it will be used in the scheme decided upon. The half block is 330 feet by 165 feet, and it is planned to build modern stores of one story, facing on Second Ave., 8th Street and First Ave. A private street, 30 feet wide, will be opened in the center of the block, running from First to Second Ave.

The plans afford numerous entrances and exits, combining perfect safety with striking modern conveniences. Among the latter are refreshment sections, on the right and left of the auditorium. These sections will be raised two feet or so above the level of the floor of the auditorium proper, and will afford a view of the screen while patrons are partaking refreshments. The ground floor of the amusement palace will seat 1300 people and the balcony 900. An added feature of the structure will be a summer garden extending over the roofs of the stores already referred to, and affording a promenade about one-eighth of a mile in length.

Excavations for the building have already been started and construction will be rushed, so as to have everything completed as soon as possible after the first of the New Year.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Miss Kathlyn Williams stopped over in El Paso, at her father's home, on her journey to the Edendale studio. Miss Williams was given several impromptu receptions during her stay in the Texas border town. On her way to El Paso she was recognized on the train by several passengers, who introduced themselves and made her journey very pleasant.

Mr. and Mrs. P. W. Alexander of Nampa, Idaho, were visitors at the World office last week. Mr. Alexander is part owner of the Orpheum Theater in his home city. While here they visited the Selig and Essanay plants and were much delighted with their experience. They left for home Sunday, October 20th. Mr. Alexander stated that he had changed his service from the Salt Lake branch of the G. F. Co. to the Portland branch. Mr. Tschumy, Mr. Alexander's partner, will take an automobile trip through California, Arizona and New Mexico on Mr. Alexander's arrival.

C. M. Christenson, national secretary of the M. P. E. L. of America, stopped over in Chicago on Friday for a few hours on his way to St. Louis. Wm. J. Sweeney accompanied him. While in St. Louis they transacted business with the new insurance company connected with motion picture theaters.

The Animated Weekly representative took moving pictures showing the departure of Theodore Roosevelt, from Mercy Hospital to the railroad station. Watterson Rothacker was in charge of the camera squad. Mr. Rothacker left for Portland, Oregon, on Monday evening, October 21st, on a business trip. He will remain one day in Portland and will thence proceed direct to New York City.

E. S. PORTER RESIGNS FROM UNIVERSAL.

Announcement was made on October 19th by Mr. Edwin S. Porter, of his resignation from the Universal Film Manufacturing Co., to take effect at once. Mr. Porter has also disposed of all his holdings and financial interest in the corporation. This leaves him free to devote all his time to his favorite project, The Famous Players Film Co., in which he is interested with Mr. Daniel Frohman and Mr. Adolph Zucker.

For a long time Mr. Porter has been planning to get away from the weekly release routine and devote his expert ability to the making of bigger and better productions unhampered by time limitations. In his new surroundings he will be fancy free and will have carte blanche, plus all the time he wants to do things right. Mr. Porter is a wealthy man and money will be a secondary consideration in comparison with the pleasure he can obtain from his art.

Temporarily Mr. James Carleton will be Mr. Porter's successor as technical director of the Universal until the permanent man is decided upon.

BIG MIRROR SCREEN FOR NEWARK, N. J.

A new theater is being built by John C. Eisele at No. 80 Belleville Ave., Newark, N. J., in which is being installed the biggest mirror screen in the state, at the cost of $1,200. It was sold by the Mirror Screen Co. of Shelbyville, Ind., through their New York representative, G. A. Manning. The size of this mirror screen is 13 ft. 6 in. by 18 ft.

AS TO THE EXHIBITORS' BALL.

President Sam Trigger of the New York State Exhibitors called at the World office during the week. Asked about the Exhibitors' Ball, he remarked there were things doing. Some of these are:

William Sulzer, Democratic candidate for Governor of New York, will be present.

The members of the Screen Club will give a "first part" of a minstrel show, with King Baggot as interlocutor and John Bunny as one of the end men. The Screen Club will have two boxes and also two special tables. A hundred tickets will be sent to the club for the use of the members.

A letter has been received from "Pop" Lubin stating that he will be present, with as many of his actors and actresses as he can bring with him.

Maurice Costello and Miss Florence Lawrence and King Baggot and Miss Alice Joyce will be at the head of the grand march.

General Sales Manager Wright of the Kalem Company has given assurances that he will be present with the whole force of Kalem players, and has engaged a box for their accommodation.

A letter has been received from "Pop" Rock asking for the reservation of two boxes for the Vitagraph players and also two tables.

John Bunny has been very insistent on the setting aside of a table for himself, in order that he may adequately take care of some of his many friends.

Joe Engel, of the Universal, has engaged four automobiles and a private band for his party.

Harry Raver has engaged two boxes for the use of himself and his friends.

Three bands have been engaged for the great event, and they are under contract until 5 A. M.

Orders have been received for more than 700 tickets from up the state. Vice-President Cornell of Syracuse has engaged a special car, which will be attached to a train making stops at the principal stations. Anyone desiring to take advantage of this car may obtain information from Mr. Cornell.

A. B. Coleman, chairman of the Ball Committee, has disposed of more than 500 tickets among Jersey exhibitors.

James Wallace, chief of the Bureau of Licenses, who has just returned from his honeymoon, will be present at the ball with Mrs. Wallace.

Mr. Trigger has sent a special invitation to Woodrow Wilson, and the president of the exhibitors has reason to believe Mr. Wilson will be present.

"And don't forget to state," concluded Mr. Trigger, "that the date is November 14; the place Palm Garden, Lexington Ave., and 58th St. And also that we are going to have a regular time."

PURELY PERSONAL.

Thomas H. Ince, general western manager of the New York Motion Picture Company for their Coast studios, is now vice-president of the Broncho Film Company, producers of the Broncho brand, which are made by the same producer and associates as formerly made the Bison 101 pictures.

Richard Spencer, editor of scenarios for the New York Motion Picture Company, is back at work in California following his recent vacation trip in the East, which included a stay in New York. While here Mr. Spencer greeted many old friends—and made many new ones.

Edwin B. Hesser of the home office of Kinemacolor left New York Wednesday for a week's trip to Chicago.

Miss Evelyn Francis, who for a long time has been playing leads in Champion films, was cast in Vitagraph's "Four Days a Widow," taking the part of Helen, Marjorie's friend. Miss Francis, while young in years, has talent and a good personality, and has made a distinct success on the screen.

Mr. Warner, the "features" man, announces that Mr. Thrash, formerly connected with the Consolidated Exchange of New Orleans, has taken charge of the Warner's Features" office at Dallas, Texas. The Feature Film Company of New Orleans, has taken the agency for "Warner's Features," and will have exclusive control of Mr. Warner's productions in Louisiana, Alabama and Mississippi.

SARAH BERNHARDT'S "LA TOSCA."

The sole rights for New York State for the above money making feature has been secured by Messrs. Weinberg & Samwick, of 32 Union Square, New York City. Some of the managers that have already booked this classic report record receipts.

Exhibitors should be careful in booking these various features and do business only with the State Right owners, otherwise they may be liable for damages.

Dobbs' Alaska Pictures

Marvelous Motion Views of Scenes and Life Amid Ice and Snow.

MUCH has been said about the wonders of Alaska. There have even been motion pictures showing something of those wonders. But it remained for Beverly B. Dobbs, explorer and cinematographer, to bring Alaska to our firesides.

Beverly B. Dobbs.

Mr. Dobbs is almost a resident of Alaska, having lived there for the past fourteen years and taken an active part in the development of that wonderful country. Being a photographer and familiar with the moving picture camera, he made the most of his opportunity to record upon the films in Alaska as it is lived by the natives and the people who have gone to that region in search of wealth and adventure. After all those years of exploiting and picture making, Mr. Dobbs decided to come to the greater centers of civilization and show the wonderful scenes he had taken.

It will be impossible for us here to describe at length the interesting pictures which Mr. Dobbs has brought with him He has some 20,000 feet of truly fine pictures—fine in a photographic sense and highly instructive in an educational way. At a recent private exhibition in the auditorium of the American Museum of Natural History, New York City, a representative of the Moving Picture World had the pleasure of viewing a number of Mr. Dobbs' subjects. There were shown at that time "The Ice Packs in the Arctic," showing a great stream of ice which flows through Bering Straits with irresistible force in the spring of each year. Native sea hunters on their expeditions in search of game; dog teams; the pursuit and capture of a polar bear. All is vividly depicted as though seen by one's own eye instead of that of the camera.

There were "Living Picture in the Arctic," showing the Eskimo following his daily vocations and taking part in dances and other amusements.

Eskimo Boy with Reindeer.

There was a cruise to Siberia in the trading schooner "Sea Wolf," showing the rugged coasts of Siberia; trading with the natives by the light of the midnight sun with pictures of Siberian natives.

Another series show the "United States Mail Dog Team," and the method of carrying the mails over the ice and snow; an Eskimo boy with a reindeer; an Eskimo mission.

The most interesting series is entitled "The Walrus Hunt," in which Mr. Dobbs engaged. Walrus are shown in their native haunts, basking in the warmth of an ice floe; the method of killing and securing the skins and tusks. The final scene in this series was taken from the deck of the schooner and shows hundreds upon hundreds of walrus floundering about in the water with elephantine grace. For they weigh as much as 5,000 pounds each.

Scenes were also shown of the mining operations at Nome, with the miners sluicing the gold from great heaps of pay dirt; dredging it from the beds of rivers and from the ocean beaches, or washing it out of the hills by the hydraulic process. No better pictures of this phase of life in Alaska have ever been shown.

In many respects Mr. Dobbs' series of motion views has never been equaled. Clearness of photography is the finest that has ever come from Alaska, and the subjects are enlivened by scenes of great interest throughout. This is the first time Mr. Dobbs has brought his films to New York, but they were on exhibition for 350 nights at Chicago, where they eclipsed all other exhibitions in point of attendance. It is Mr. Dobbs' intention to give public exhibitions of his pictures in New York and to market them throughout the United States and foreign countries by the State rights plan as outlined by his advertisement in another page of this issue of the Moving Picture World.

A MONTGOMERY BOOSTER IN TOWN.

The Moving Picture World wishes to acknowledge a pleasant call from Mr. C. E. Buchanan, of Atlanta, Ga., who is a member of the Board of Directors of the Montgomery Amusement Company and one of the Montgomery Boosters. Mr. Buchanan is a very prominent business man of Atlanta and is largely interested in the Montgomery enterprises.

"The Miracle"

(Four Reels—Continental Kunstfilm Co.).

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

"THE MIRACLE," as produced by the "Continental Kunstfilm Company" of Berlin, Germany, comes very near to the best productions of cinematography. It is a work of rare artistic excellence and should please all kinds of audiences. It is distinctly spectacular, "adapted to excite wonder and admiration by a display of pomp and scenic effects." "The Miracle," indeed, is far more than that. It possesses in a high degree that accuracy in settings and costumes, which is but too rarely found in purely spectacular productions. Its story, though old and simple, is rich in dramatic incidents, all of which are natural, striking and full of life and action. The work of some master hand, heretofore unknown on this side of the water, is plainly discernible in every inch of the four reels. The gifted artist shows his talent and his skill in many ways, often too subtle almost for analysis, but never failing in their effects upon the audience. There can be no question, that much time was spent on this production and that every detail was carefully considered.

"The Miracle" is based on an old legend, well-known in all Catholic countries. In the sanctuary of a convent—thus runs the story—there was a miraculous statue of the Holy Virgin, the object of the special veneration of the nuns and the faithful generally. One of the nuns yielding to the entreaties of a young knight deserted the sisterhood and forgetting her solemn vows ran off with her lover. The Holy Virgin, not wishing disgrace to fall upon her convent, descends from her pedestal in the sanctuary and takes the place of the faithless nun. The latter is soon afterwards discarded by her lover and she enters upon a life of sin, shame, sorrow and suffering. In the end she comes back to the convent, where she learns from the Madonna herself, how her absence had been hidden from the other nuns and pouring out her grateful prayers before the altar, upon which the Virgin resumes her place as a statue, she returns once more to the peace of the cloistered shades.

This plot, essentially the same as that of Maeterlinck's famous play which had such a successful run in one of the Broadway theaters during the last season is in the films much amplified and elaborated. Various incidents and episodes, more or less closely connected with the main story are introduced. Beatrice's stay among the robbers is strongly reminiscent of "Ingomar." I must add, that every one of the additions and elaborations was cleverly conceived and splendidly executed. They afforded a grand chance for superb scenic displays and the dramatic movements of large groups of men and women. Of this chance the makers of these films have made the best possible use. They have re-created a bit of medieval Europe with such skilled realism and lifelikeness as is rarely found even in the best of pictures. We see the ancient castles of the feudal barons; the turreted bastions, in which the look-out held his steady vigil; the roomy chambers with their rounded panes of leaded glass and their triumps of the wood-carver's art in the shape of solid and handsome chairs and tables; we admire the rich and yet chaste and elegant costumes, setting off the human figure to such advantage; we get a glimpse of how the men and women of those days thought and lived and acted, what manners they had and how great the power was of lord over serf and vassal. Often we are pleasantly reminded by what we see of many a tale told by the author of "Ivanhoe."

No picture has furnished better proof than "The Miracle" of how far the motion picture leaves behind the novel and the stage when the life and the very atmosphere of a by-gone age are to be brought before the eye. The motion picture is indeed far more than a mere vehicle for dramatic composition. The mere naked story of "The Miracle," as it has lived in Catholic tradition, could have been told in perhaps less than a thousand feet, but we would then have missed a noble and exquisite gallery of moving pictures. We could never have understood and appreciated and enjoyed the story as we enjoy it in these films. Here the pictured story is indeed complete. It has delighted rather than tired us to watch the elaboration of all the splendid and lavish details. We carry away with us a most pleasureable sensation; we feel, that we have read a thrilling novel, told by a master pen but that we have been spared the work of running through many printed pages; we experience at the same time the satisfaction that comes from seeing a fine play upon the stage. Such features as "The Miracle" are educational in the highest degree.

I do not, in all the four reels, recollect a single scene, that was taken in a studio. There are many fine specimens of feudal architecture in Germany and the producers of "The Miracle" seem to have selected some of the best. The interiors, too, seemed all to be genuine and were evidently rooms and halls in medieval castles, that may have been standing for many centuries. While this feature is epic rather than dramatic in its construction it must not be thought that the dramatic parts have in any way been neglected. On the contrary the acting all the way from the beginning to the end is above criticism with only a few slight exceptions. I think the allegorical figures representing Virtue and Vice were not happily conceived, though the idea of creating such allegorical figures was very good in itself. As these figures appear but three or four times the defect is indeed but a minor one and in no way detracts from the general merits of this remarkable feature.

No picture that I have seen affords greater opportunities for effective and impressive music than "The Miracle." Every person looking at the pictures must feel a longing for the sound of music. The owners of the American rights have recognized the musical opportunities of the play and have provided a complete musical score, said to have been composed by a competent musician. It is claimed that the music is thoroughly appropriate to the subject. It might be well to have the picture explained in certain parts, but this is not nearly as necessary to the complete success of the picture as the musical accompaniment. If I may venture another suggestion to the exhibitor I would recommend to run the picture with a moderate degree of speed and to have either no intermissions at all or very short ones only. Of course the last recommendation applies to all feature films consisting of two or more reels, but it seems to me to apply with special force to a play like "The Miracle" where the interest is so quickly roused. That interest should for the benefit of the spectator be maintained without any breaks.

Scene from "The Miracle" (Continental Kunstfilm Co.).

In conclusion it seems just to make mention of the fact, that this feature is the first of its kind to come from the hands of German manufacturers. So far the German producers have always brought up the rear of the procession. If they are capable of producing more such features as "The Miracle" they will soon have to be reckoned with as important factors in the film markets of the world.

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH IN THE CHURCH.

A Power's No. 6 A has been installed by the New York Film Exchange in the Church of The Redemptorist Fathers, 59th Street and 6th Avenue, Brook'yn.

ITALA WILL MAKE REGULAR RELEASES.

Beginning November 25, the Itala Film Co. of America will make regular releases of the popular Itala brand of films, as officially stated by the American head of the company to-day.

The policy of the American company will provide comedy subjects in vast variety, these to be selected with care from large consignments of samples and released after "Americanizing" all titles and sub-titles. The Itala brand of films is noted for the excellence of its comedies particularly as no expense is spared to make them really laughable. In an interview some time ago, Mr. Sciemenga of the Torino studios stated that if it were necessary to tear down a block of buildings to create a laugh the Itala company would not hesitate to incur the expense. The trade remembers many Itala subjects that bear out the above statement in a sense. Shops were demolished, statuary, bric a brac and even buildings were smashed to bits that a comedy scene might be made effective.

The Itala company's first release, however, will consist of a feature subject originally made in two short reels, but since reduced to a single thousand feet of spirited action. The title, "Horror of Sin," gives but a faint idea of the value of the subject as a sermon film, but the story is unusual in its treatment of the social evil in that it carefully avoids sensationalism even though it holds the attention of the spectator from the first scene to the last. Following the initial release the Itala company will issue two-subject comedies regularly each Monday. No single subject reels will be included in the output.

An innovation in posters will be introduced by Mr. Raver, the American head of the company. Each split reel will be accompanied by a two-subject litho in colors, a scene from each subject being shown in an appropriate panel with the title attached. Shipments will be made through the Film Supply Co. of America.

THE PRESS AGENT SAYS.

The box office drawing power of Essanay's "Broncho Billy" films with Mr. G. M. Anderson, and the "Alkali" Ike comedies with Augustus Carney, is fully realized by exhibitors throughout the entire country, who declare that the running of these pictures, on their dullest days, increases receipts from twenty-five to fifty per cent. This is not to be wondered at when it is realized that no other company in the present day film game has two such popular favorites as the character-creations of "Broncho Billy" and "Alkali" Ike. And then there is Francis X. Bushman with Essanay's Eastern stock. Some popularity trio, this —Anderson, Carney and Bushman!

How Not to Do It.

TAKE a look at these two cuts. They picture the front of the Comedy Theater, Fourteenth Street near Broadway, in New York City. And the funny part of it is that the photographs have been sent in by the manager as samples of his enterprise.

For months we have been promising ourselves to come over with our camera some Sunday and make a photograph of this lurid front and the one next door, but hustling a big camera fifteen miles is more or less like hard work and—all things come to him who waits—and these pictures were supplied by the management.

To understand the matter, the out-of-town reader must know that this house and the Crystal Hall next door are situated on the south side of Union Square—which itself is a part of Fourteenth Street. Probably more persons pass these two theaters than any other houses in town, not even excepting the Herald Square Theater, at Broadway and Thirty-fifth Street. Pretty close to half a million persons pass these two fronts every day and get the idea that the pictures are on the same dime museum level that they were ten years ago solely and entirely because these two managers think that they must appeal with the sensational. These two pictures both show the Comedy Theater front. The Crystal Hall is worse in that it seldom uses any regular paper while the Comedy does mix the regular paper with the lurid stuff that they get from the lithograph houses; the dead issues of a still more defunct day of gory melodrama.

We believe that we are entirely within the facts when we state our belief that these two managements do more to hurt the motion picture business in the eyes and minds of the general public than ANY TEN HOUSES IN THE ENTIRE COUNTRY.

This is a pretty broad statement, but it is a fact. More persons see these poster displays than see any other one house. More persons see these displays than notice any other hundred houses. More persons stay away because they believe that the pictures are still blood and thunder stuff than are influenced by any other fifty houses, because there is nothing here but scarlet sensation and bloodthirsty misstatement.

The Same as the Others.

The films run here are the same as are run at any other house in town. They are the regular releases, most of which are passed by the Board of Censorship and none of which live up to the lurid paper on the outside of the house. Could the public be coaxed within, the result of the paper would not be so harmful, but most of the people who look at the signs pass on without investigation and THEY CLASS THEIR OWN NEIGHBORHOOD HOUSES WITH THESE.

As we came past the theaters to-day the Comedy had a 28-sheet poster showing a mob of convicts in their striped suits of shame. One man was down and another was about to kill him, while a third man intervened with the captioned statement that "His life belongs to me." At the upper end of Union Square, more than 600 feet away this poster stood out strong and distinct. It was the keynote to the situation. It gave a decent man mental nausea that such things should be filmed and he did not investigate further.

But the paper was the paper of an extinct melodrama. It had absolutely no bearing on the films on exhibition inside. It was simply a lying lure, a deliberate misstatement of fact, and this large poster was backed up by a lot of smaller sheets showing crimes of all sorts and descriptions, Indian battles and every form of violence, most of which are on exhibition every day in the year, being mounted on cloth and put out day after day until they become worn when they are replaced by others of the same sort. Not one was applicable to the film and on Thursday of last week the Comedy had only five sheets bearing titles and trade marks and the Crystal Hall did not have a single sheet of paper that was in the slightest degree descriptive of the films on view.

Influence Is Bad.

And yet thousands of men and women pass these gory displays day after day, barely glancing at the display and wondering what there is in the moving pictures to arouse such enthusiasm. They judge the performance entirely by the front and gain only a confused idea of a series of assorted murders, thefts, assaults and jail deliveries that almost complet ly obscure the entrances. They are not to blame that they do not know that the average motion picture of to-day is as refined and uplifting as the drama should be. Even when they go to their home town and see the modest and truthful displays of their locality house they are not attracted. They merely argue that the manager of a house in the home section dares not be as frank as the New York man, but they suppose that if they enter they will see the same rivers of blood as flow from the shrieking sheets in front of these Fourteenth Street houses and in their minds the pictures are inseparably connected with the vile stuff that is shown on these two prominent fronts.

In Mexico there exists a pleasant law that any announcement shown on the bill boards must be in the show or the proprietors must go to jail. If this law was current in New York and strictly enforced, such houses as these could not last, but there is no such law and as a result the pictures within a radius of fifty miles are damned in the minds of many would-be patrons because a couple of short-sighted managers have the entirely erroneous idea that sensation pays and find their buckets of blood on the shelves of stock paper since it does not exist in the films themselves to any such degree. If such matters merely affected the houses in question we would have no complaint to make, but for every peron attracted by this shrieking appeal, perhaps hundreds are driven away from other houses and these two establishments hurt the business of probably every house in Greater New York, with no profit to themselves.

And yet the manager of the Comedy is so proud of his accomplishments that he has special photographs of his displays made. It may not be polite to use them as the inspiration for this discussion and yet we can do the manager no greater favor than to point out that he is hurting himself, as well as his brother exhibitors throughout the city.

What Might Be Done.

These two locations are among the highest priced in the city and probably in the country. We know that several years ago the two lower floors of the building next door, the ground and first story and basement were held at $20,000 yearly rental, though the frontage is something less than twenty-five feet, but with a depth of about 175 feet. It is one of the most traveled sections of New York and we believe that if the sensational should be thrown over greater gain would be possible through a straight show and honest announcement. They must make money or they could not keep open, but they could make even more if they would make their appeal to the better class of trade.

Thousands of cloak and suit makers from lower Fifth Avenue pass the door twice daily. Thousands of others, shop girls and clerks make their way home past the entrances, but it is a mistake to suppose that even these white slaves of trade are wholly interested in blood and thunder and the unclean and illegal.

For every man attracted by a murder there are a score who will be attracted by decent films. As long as three years ago when Keith's, on the block east, was filled with interested patrons we would come out of the Keith house and drop into the Comedy to find the house half full, and yet the house has but a quarter the capacity of the then Keith and Proctor house. They could fill with the Keith overflow if they advertised properly and decently.

There is not an honest exhibitor in New York who does not wish the abolishment of the stock paper and the lurid advertisement. Go down the Bowery and Park Row, through Delancey and Grand streets, anywhere on the East Side, where murder might be supposed to appeal if it appeals at all, and you will find only the paper of the films. Tour Third and Second avenues from their start to the Harlem River and you will find little, if any, stock paper. It all belongs to the film. The Comedy and Crystal Hall stand almost alone in the old, timeworn tradition, and yet, of the thousands who pass the houses they draw a percentage, small, but enough to pay a profit, and so these two places remain a stench in the nostrils, excrescences on the new order of things.

And they are proud of it. That's the part that would be funny were it not so serious.

On the other hand.

Turning to more pleasant things we have the late Edison releases to consider. There is a real kiddie story, October 28th, in the story of a Fresh Air Fund youngster who seeks "The Land Beyond the Sunset," in which the practical is mingled with the fanciful in the adroit fashion of which Mr. Plimpton is a master. Young Mrs. Eaton (Nov. 1st) touches a new theme; the wife who raises money for bridge debts by buying things and pawning them, a scheme not altogether unknown to New York women of fashion, but which is new in films. A Romance of the Rails (Nov. 5th) is an Edison railroad story with some thrilling developments. They have not given us a railroad story lately, but they know how to make them; made the very first one, in fact. A Queen For a Day (Nov. 5th) is the story of a colored maid who becomes queen of a cannibal tribe and rescues her employers, and there is a Yellowstone Park scenic on November 8th that is worth while. All of these are worth a little extra booming and the comedy is more than ordinarily good. The bridge story will permit an argument to be started on the evils of society gambling that can be driven home and the Fresh Air story will hit almost any town of any size. Look for them.

From Fresno.

The Fresno Photo Theater, Fresno, Cal., unhandsomely throws bricks at a recent General Film advertisement that had the stories mixed. It shows a front page for As You Like It that is mighty clever, but since they started the rock throwing we want to heave one back. They have copied the Motion Picture Story Magazine title to their story of the film in which the writing of the story is credited to Edwin M. La Roche, who had nothing whatever to do with the Vitagraph production other than he heroically rewrote Shakespeare for the magazine. Mr. La Roche had nothing to do with the preparation of the scenario or film and this should have been noted.

The Fresno offering is an eight-page folder with four scene and one portrait cuts and is very well done, the front page being printed in early spelling. Perhaps some others may find it helpful, in this or another run. It reads:

Done into an houre's entertainment by ye stars of ye Vitagraph Companye. This playe is fromme one by William Shakespeare, Bard of Avon, and it is now about to be plaide for ye firste tyme in ye silent dramatiques.

Rose Coghlan (Ye Famous Actress) - Rosalynde
Maurice Costello (Greatest Photo Playe Actor) - - - - - - Orlando
Robert McWade (Who Plaide Rip Van Winkle) - - - - Touchstone

And Ye Other Star Players are Rosemary Theby, Charles Kent, Rose Tapley, James Morrison, Kate Price, Tefft Johnson, Robert Gaillord and Harry Morey
Ye Director . . . . . Mr. Kent
And a most delightfulle musical program will be charminglie rendered

Ye Playe Will Be Presented
Sunday, Monday, & Tuesday, October 13, 14, 15

They also send a good four-page folder for the first three Edison, What Happened to Mary, series. They ran the first three stories in one evening and then told the whole town what would happen. The Mary stories are doubly useful in that they can be run singly or in series. If you have not had any of them yet or but one of the first four, get the first three in one evening—Escape from Bondage, Alone in New York and Mary in Stageland, and see what happens when you run the others as they appear.

Driving it home.

The Fresno recently took a half page in red and black ink with five large cuts telling all about the ventilating apparatus of the house. They force washed air into the house and they seemed to find it a matter of sufficient importance to take a half page in the telling. And they are right. A pure air supply that stays right on the job all season is worth a deal more booming than a film that stays two or three nights. Lots of managers fail to realize that pure air is as important as a good film, and yet at times it is more important than the picture. If your house smells like the inside of a jail about an hour after a tramps' camp has been raided and the campers imprisoned, get a fan and some flues and then start out to brag about it. It is something worth bragging about. Don't get an atomizer, get a fan. It will a great deal more than pay for itself if it is properly installed. And don't be content with merely mentioning the fact. Keep on talking about it.

Mechanical music.

The Crystal Theater, Houston, Texas, sends a mailing card booming a mechanical orchestra recently installed. Five thousand cards were sent out by mail, the device belonging to that class wherein electrical devices set the strings in vibration. They want our opinion on the subject. Our opinion is that unless the manufacturers of the instrument paid the entire cost of printing and mailing the theater gets too little from the card, which is the size of the double "return mailing card," three parts being used for advertisement and one for the address. Of the three-quarters one is wholly given over to a picture and boom of the instrument. The other quarters give one mention of the Crystal to each section and at a first glance it seems to be the advertisement of the device and not the theater. One mention is in twelve point caps and the other a twelve point bold. We would have gotten more out of it for our house if we had one or there would have been no advertisement even if the makers of the instrument paid all the costs. There are times when modesty in an advertisement pays, but too much modesty is worse than none at all. The point is that there is a new device at the Crystal Theater. Of the two the theater is more important than the device. The advertisement should be so worded and at least a chance allusion should be made to the fact that it is a place where photoplays are shown. There is not one single, solitary blessed word about photoplays in the whole advertisement. Boom your musical feature, but if you have a photoplay theater talk about photoplays every time you open your mouth.

Why?

W. L. Jennings sends in a circular that is put out in behalf of his Lyceum Theater, Monroe, La., which offers a cash prize of $5 each night except Saturday and Sunday. He says he does not approve of the cash prize, but that it was forced on him by the opposition. The idea is the usual thing. You must be in the house at the time of the drawing, and if the Federal authorities find it out there will be something said about the Lottery Law that will not make pleasant listening.

But we think if we had a house it would take something more than a competitor to make us do a thing we did not approve of. If someone else came into our town we would make him trail us until his feet got so sore he found it more pleasant to walk somewhere else. The house that adopts a competitor's ideas acknowledges the competitor as the leader and itself as a trailer. If the other fellow starts something, do something else; not just what he does. Let him copy you and keep him busy copying. The cash prize is one of the most elementary devices and it is illegal to boot. Do something else and get inside the law in doing it. One of the new schemes here in town is the Country Store, which is so successful that all of the burlesque theaters in the Western Wheel are using it. It can be modified to suit the smaller houses, since the prizes run to about a hundred dollars' worth of goods the way it is worked here.

In brief, there is a special setting showing a general store. When you get your ticket for the specified night you receive a card. After the performance certain of these cards, all of which have been filled in with the name and address of the ticket holder, are read from the stage and each of the persons called receives a prize running from a half ton of coal to a live chicken.

But the management is careful to state that the idea of the store is to get the names and addresses of the regular patrons that a mail list may be compiled and emphasis is laid upon the fact that the cards are not drawn, but are "selected" by the management. Note the distinction and keep clear of the law.

Five dollars' worth of groceries broken up into bulky parcels looks a lot more than five dollars to one person.

Splits with the ladies.

Mr. Jennings is secretary of the local fair and recently he got up a combination ticket good for his Lyceum and Maze theaters on a certain night. The combination ticket admitted to both houses for the regular admission (20 cents) and half the money went to the ladies for their section of the fair, prize money, etc. They divided $120 between them and at the same time new patrons were made for the two houses.

This sort of scheme is a lot better than following someone else's lead in prize contests. If you have opposition and it will not stay quiet do not follow the lead, but set a pace of your own and the fastest pace is more apt to call for brains than more money.

Wants Some Facts.

R. G. Peltier, of Mt. Clemens, sends in a copy of his eight-page Bijou Bulletin and asks for facts or other matter that he can run in the sheet. If Mr. Peltier will read The Moving Picture World each week he will find an abundance of material, so much, indeed, that this department does not attempt to compete with the run of the paper in this direction. In the Los Angeles letter there is always plenty of gossip of the players, there are other personal notes scattered through the pages and every page almost carries something that can be used. The stuff is not labeled nor is it always in just the right form, but the material is there in all sorts of shapes merely waiting to be picked up.

The Bulletin is going in strong for advertising. It seems to follow the Tenth Street Theater program in choice of type and display, but there is one-third program and two-thirds advertising. It would pay to play up the program part more strongly by the use of heavy rule or some similar device. There are numerous small paragraphs that look much like the program matter and we think that the advertising value to the house is lost. The idea is good, but the real material is not thrown into sufficient prominence. Boxing in the program part would not hurt the value of the rest and bring the house into its own. The numbered bulletin scheme is used to "make it stick," the prize being a dollar's worth of tickets.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Our Club and Others.

THAT little club of photoplaywrights we spoke of in a recent issue is hung up for a few weeks because of an impending absence from town. We hoped to have it framed up and self-running before we left, but pressure of other matters prevents and so we are going to let it drop until some time in November when the weekly meetings will commence. We have had numerous letters of acceptance and think we shall start off with a sufficient number to make things interesting and not too many to be awkward at the start.

Meantime we have the address of a Chicago writer who is desirous of getting in touch with others of the craft and forming a talk-over circle in that city. If you are in Chicago, and have written a script that has gone through, send us your name and address and it will be sent to the organizer. We hope that others will come forward to form circles that in time will become chapters of the parent club when we get ready to organize—which will not be for some time yet, we think.

Terwilliger Not Lubin, Editor.

A theatrical publication in a late issue stated that George W. Terwilliger was the editor for the Lubin company, which does not happen to be the fact. Mr. Terwilliger has become a regular contributor to the Lubin company, but he is not a member of the staff and has not replaced Lawrence S. McCloskey as editor.

The October Issue.

Printed in its own plant for the first time, the October Photoplay Author comes from the press a trifle late, but with plenty of good material including articles by William Lord Wright, A. Van Buren Powell, R. D. Armstrong and the editor. We do not at all agree with Mr. Armstrong's suggestion that the script should be sold in synopsis form alone, but there is much else that is of value to the writers and each issue is an improvement over the last. The address has been changed to Holyoke, Mass., instead of Chicopee, since the change to the new plant brought them into the Holyoke postal district, though they remain in Chicopee.

Adding to the list.

Benjamin Barondess offers the suggestion that to the list of books the photoplay writer should read should be added "How I wrote and sold my first book." The book is in most libraries, but we do not think it would pay the beginner to purchase a copy, though the experiences of prominent writers in getting their starts is cheering to the man who cannot yet sell his stuff. It simply goes to show that if you have the right stuff in you and keep plugging away you are going to meet success some time, even though it may be a long and wearying wait.

A Suggestion.

A Pittsburg writer gives a new angle to the discussion on credit to the author on the film. He writes that he is the author of a recent Kalem and that when the local manager found that the play was by a neighbor he made a special feature of the production on a certain evening, booming it in advance. At one time the Lubin company used to write the managements of houses near an author when a play was produced, but we have not heard of this being done lately. There is no good reason why you should not tell the house manager that you wrote a certain story to the end that it may be locally boomed, but we think that that is as far as the matter is ready to go yet save in the use of names of authors and dramatists more widely known. We are not disposed to hurry this matter because we think that there is still too small a percentage of writers who are really entitled to full credit for their filmed idea, since almost every script has to be changed to suit the camera conditions and possibly to build up the dramatic interest. We think the Edison attitude the most sane. Mr. Plimpton uses the author's name if he thinks that the story warrants it. That's as much as any author has a right to ask.

Got It Wrong.

One of the script critics has a rather strenuous follow-up system for new business, but he got in wrong the other day when he wrote Captain Charles Kiener that the reason he could not sell his scripts was because he would not part with a dollar, and all this about the time that the Kalem company released three of his stories in eight days. Three years ago Captain Kiener was writing an excellent script and he has made consistent improvement ever since and the suggestion that he needs a criticism at this late day suggests that someone's mailing list stands in need of revision. His scripts are all taken by Kalem, since he seldom writes more than one a week, and so a newcomer is not as familiar with the name as we who sat on desks three years ago.

Has a System.

Edward T. Lowe, Jr., sends in a set of his printing that is of interest. He has a going envelope with the printed line "Editor of Scenarios" and a smaller self addressed one for return. Both of these are printed on the ends:

Postmaster
Do not bend or break

Each going script also carries the post card acknowledgement in the form suggested some time ago and a rejection slip not unlike those used by some of the companies, with fourteen printed reasons for rejection and blank space for remarks. Mr. Lowe says that frequently the suggestions have enabled him to make a story salable. The most original part of the system is an elaborate record envelope with all of the companies printed on the face as well as spaces for the going and return date and the reason for rejection. There are also lines for the title, date written, disposition of script and price received. All data regarding the script is placed in this envelope and the complete history of the script is kept together.

It will not pay the average writer to have these printed up, but the idea is distinctly good and may be adapted for use.

The Catechism.

William Wright, Jr., in speaking of a recent suggestion that you be your own best fault finder, advances this set of questions that he puts to himself when his own scripts come back.

Is it logical?
Is it the desired material?
Is the plot really novel?
Is the plot strong enough?

We would suggest that these be added.

Does the company make that style of story?
Does the plot suit the time of year?
Are the points properly brought out that others may see them as I do?
Can I make it better by changing it around?
Send in your suggestions and some day we'll run the full catechism.

Fred Mace.

In the Inquiry department several correspondents have sought to establish the theatrical record of Fred Mace, so we wrote Mr. Mace asking that he supply us with some material of an autobiographical nature and a picture to go with it. The picture came with the remark that while it might not be as beautiful as that on the cut of Wallace and Douglas recently published in these columns it looked more as he does at the present day. This is what he told us:

Mr. Fred Mace.

"In 1899 I graduated in Medicine and in 1898 in Dentistry in Philadelphia, practiced dentistry in Erie, Pa., for about thirteen months, then joined Wilbur Opera Co. I was with them about six months then joined Florodora in which I played Tweedlepunch; the Chinese Honeymoon, following Tom Seabrooke as Mr. Pineapple; then Piff Paff Pouf, following Eddie Foy as the Sandman; then The Umpire, playing the Umpire; then Johnny Hicks in The Time, the Place and the Girl. I went to London for little over a year, playing in the big production of Sands O'Dee at the Hippodrome for fifteen weeks. Lawson Butt, who this year is playing Lewis Wallers part in Garden of Allah was in Sands O'Dee production playing the heavy. Came back here, went to Frisco and played thirty-one weeks in stock. Joined Chocolate Soldier and played Col. Popoff the father during the Chicago engagement of twenty-two weeks. Joined Biograph in May, 1911, played with them until their return East from here (Los Angeles), in May, 1912, then joined the Bison."

Testimony.

Here's a letter from a new chum as the Australians have it. He hails from Chicago, though his remark that he cannot see films suggests some western fastness. Here is his writing record:

> I have been a regular reader of the MOVING PICTURE WORLD for four issues now—since the Mirror lost the Spectator—and am kicking myself because I did not start sooner. Anyway, I write to avail myself of your offer of a correct list of addresses, and to unload a few scattering comments. This latter I may repeat from time to time and trust that you will advise me when I have entered the nuisance class.
> I started out last October; wrote three scenarios; had all three rejected; became discouraged; and quit. In January I picked up a little courage and sent out No. 3 again. When it didn't come back after a couple of weeks I swelled out my chest and wrote five more. No. 3 was accepted but the other five were all turned down and again I became discouraged and quit. Then last July, I visited the Essanay plant while on my vacation and got the fever again. Since then I have been sticking at it, and a few nights ago I mailed out No. 17. Now I have had one produce ("Twilight," Essanay, Sept. 6th), another accepted, and have seven out for consideration, two of which are being held for decision. Incidentally, of my seventeen scenarios, I have rewritten seven once and one twice, while I am holding four now for rewrite. I figure my first year as very profitable, and think that at the end of another year I will be able to qualify as a photoplaywright.
> I am writing on the paper I use. With it I find that I never go over two cents postage, even on the big original envelope. I use stamped envelopes, a white No. 8 and a buff No. 7 for the enclosure. The idea of the buff is to keep me from getting heart disease every time the postman approaches with a long white envelope. My scenario form is my own, and I think it is as clear as any, and much clearer than some. I am indebted to your book on technique, which I purchased several weeks ago, for some mighty good pointers, and have added a scene plot to my scenarios.
> To a chance duplication of plot I am indebted for an acquaintanceship with a young writer in New Orleans and we find it very profitable to mail all our scenarios to the other for criticism. I think my criticisms of his efforts help me as much as his notes on mine.
> I am handicapped in a way by being so situated that I do not see a moving picture once in a month, and am compelled to draw on my recollections of several years ago when I used to see practically all the licensed releases. That was when Pathe (French) and Biograph divided the honors. For a while I attempted to read the reviews, but now I trust to luck that I do not step on someone's toes, and so far have had no trouble, other than in determining what companies to send a scenario to.

We think the correspondent will be interested in the statement made elsewhere that Kinemacolor wants photoplay scripts. With "Spectator" helping David Miles read the script, authors should get first class treatment.

We do not like the idea of white or buff envelopes. These sevens and eights are post office sizes and correspond to the nines and tens of the stationer. The post office issues a good grade of stock, but not good enough to carry a heavy script. Strong manila stock is cheaper and better in every way.

We don't see how an author is going to sell to advantage if he does not keep in touch with the market. He should see some photoplays each week and keep in touch with the trend of the companies through the special articles and the Stories of the Films.

The exchange of criticism is a capital scheme, in line with our own suggestion last week that authors get together to talk over ideas. A study of the other fellow's mistakes is sometimes more helpful than a study of your own—because you are more apt to note the other chap's breaks.

Doing things right.

Some correspondents have suggested that we are riding our hobby too hard when we urge that things be done properly, but we are insistent on this point because we know we are right. It pays to send scripts out with all the small points looked after. The editor feels that the script that is physically perfect; that gives evidence of proper care in preparation must be above the slovenly story on thin paper crammed into an envelope a size too small. In our own practice we use ready printed addressed envelopes for those we submit too frequently and this is what one editor said:

> If I'm ever a free lance I'm going to use printed envelopes, for no matter how many scripts are piled on an editor's desk and no matter how cold blooded the editor is, he's bound to feel there's a difference between the scripts in the printed envelope and "the other stuff" and he will unconsciously give them special attention. We're all human.

Of course this doesn't mean that if you address your scripts to the editor on a printing press instead of in longhand you will sell your story, but it does mean that if you do things right your story will have a shade the best of it over the stuff equally good but not so well displayed. It pays to be careful and correct. It pays both in money and increased acceptance. BUT first you must have the stuff to sell.

Timing the films

A Denver correspondent wants to know how long it will take to act out a photoplay of given length. He does not state what that given length is, but the answer is simple. A film should run as many seconds as there are feet, but, as a rule, there are marked variations from this standard. In the studio the normal speed is a foot a second, but given any particular scene it all depends upon the director how long a scene will run. One man may make thirty feet and another sixty from the same scene because one works quickly and the other with deliberation. Unless you know intimately the methods of the particular director who will make your script it is better to get your story over and leave the time to him. Some directors work with stop watches and others merely guess at it, but given a script, no two directors will produce a picture of a stated length scene for scene, though all will get it to about a thousand feet if there is that much subject there—and sometimes when there is more or less.

As a rule, a subject will run in from sixteen to eighteen minutes for each thousand feet. Leaders will run about a foot a word and letters about twenty-five to forty feet according to length. There is ten feet allowed for the title and about eight for the censorship tag.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of studio addresses, kept up to-date, will be sent if a stamped and addressed return envelope accompanies the request.

CYNTHIA—Our Biograph identifier thinks it was the Fairbanks sisters in "An Unseen Enemy," but is not prepared to swear to it. The auto owner in the same, and who was robbed in the park in "A Change of Spirit," was Walter C. Miller, lately of Reliance. The other question was answered lately. We think William Mason is still with Essanay. We find him cast. Miss Mary Pickford is under contract to Belasco, but we do not know what will be her first play. Someone told someone, who told someone, who told us, that she was to get $350 a week on a long-term contract.

J. M. P.—In Biograph's "The Inner Circle," George Lestini was the widower and J. Jiquel Lanoe the rich Italian. We have answered the second question. Dupray, in "The Curtain Pole," was Mack Sennet. The others the identifier passed.

C. S.—Charles West was the poor husband in "One is Business, &c." You have Mr. August correctly placed.

D. K. N.—We believe that Lubin is the only company now supplying a form sheet for a return envelope, though Vitagraph and Essanay may be queried.

H. B.—Solax casts are more or less a secret. Reliance and Majestic are two companies, though they occupy studios in the same building.

R. R. P., Stamford.—We must decline to handle your questions until you stop using a lead pencil and using the first newspaper that comes to hand for stationery. We have paid six cents postage due on your last three communications, but it is the lead pencil and your practise of using up the contents of the waste basket that we most object to. Use ink, decent paper, write plainly and pay postage in full. And please don't get the idea that you are compelled to ask questions every week. There are others willing to help you out in the task of filling this column.

F. M. N.—Numerous companies follow the reprehensible practise of marking someone else's script with the studio record number instead of following the Munsey practise of marking the envelope. Fool them by backing your script with a blank sheet and masking the front with a title page that may be replaced quickly.

M. P. BUG—This department is for the man who wants to know a name now and then, not for those who ask for full casts.

MRS. J. E. D.—Do not send pictures for identification. Ask "Who played such a part in such a production."

M. A. B.—From the number of complaints we have received of late regarding the enterprise you mention, we think your best plan would be to interest the Post Office Inspectors through your local postmaster, and after this, when you read in this paper that such schemes are unreliable, you'll probably believe us. The last issue of their alleged magazine has not shown up and the "Motion Picture Story Magazine" seems to have discontinued their advertising.

ORIENT.—We do not see where you offend in asking questions. Ask all you want, in reason. Miss Ethel Clayton was the lead in Lubin's "The Last Rose of Summer." In Kalem's "When Youth Meets Youth," Miss Lillian Christy was the girl and Carlyle Blackwell the elder brother. In "So Near and Yet So Far," the male lead was Walter C. Miller, who comes from Reliance and Rex.

W. B. I.—Sounds as though you were trying to have fun with the Answers Man. That's not nice. Your identification is not correct.

T. R.—Harry Benham and Miss Mignon Anderson had the leads in Thanhouser's "When a Count Counted." Miss Alice Weeks and Irving Cummings led in Reliance's "Thelma." We do not find that other title on our cards. Try again.

R. S.—As a general thing you can get a chance to learn the camera only through some friend who knows. There is no average salary for cameraman or apprentice. There are no definite apprentices, for that matter.

H. H. A.—The Powers Prize Winners were published some time ago. Their pictures have not been published by us. Mr. Carroll was pictured in the last Photoplay Author, and we believe that Mr. Anderson is next on the list.

ONE WHO LIKES—This publication is the only one giving Biograph names. In "Big Sister" the society woman was Miss Florence La Badie. Daphne Wayne is merely the English name for Miss Blanche Sweet, which is the real name of the "Biograph Blonde." Wallace Reid seems to be with Bison-Universal. Our subscription price is three dollars yearly.

G. S.—Miss Madge Orlamond was the aunt in "A Little Family Affair,' and the mother in "A Husband's Awakening." The Lubin company seems "long" on clever character women.

J. F.—We know of no American company purchasing costume plays from outside contributors.

E. J. G.—Alice in "A Temporary Truce" was Miss Blanche Sweet. We do not place the man you ask for. In "The Female of the Species," the women are: wife, Miss Clair McDowell; sister, Miss Mary Pickford, and the suspected girl Miss Dot Bernard. In "Swords and Hearts" the dancée was Miss Claire McDowell and the poor man's daughter Miss Dot West.

L. E. S.—Your first identifications are correct. Miss Normand frequently played with Fred Mace and Mack Sennet in the Biograph comedies, and now appears with them in the Keystone. There seems to be no reason for confounding Miss Normand with Miss Sweet. You are most assuredly correct.

INTERESTED—Cannot answer the Pathe. See above for "Thelma." A "commercial" film is one that is more than thirty days old; one that is no longer a "dated" run, but one of the general stock. Some very old licensed reels and some newer independents can be had for ten dollars a reel upward, according to condition. Licensed pictures may not now be sold, as they are merely leased to the exchanges.

L. M.—We lack the Biograph character your first question asks for. Miss Sweet is still with Biograph. Misses Bernard and Pickford are not. Send an address for the third question. We believe Mr. Hyde has wented.

M. P. W. READER—Do better than that for a signature. Mr. Johnson played opposite Miss Leonard in Biograph and Reliance. Charles West was the successful suitor in "A Disappointed Mamma." Keystone films are made in Los Angeles. Camera lenses are variously priced. You can get one for $25 or pay $100.

Comments on the Films

"THE PLOT THAT FAILED" (Kalem), October 18.—Jane Wolfe as the adventuress bears off the honors in this strong drama. It is a story of the attempt of an unscrupulous manufacturer to get possession of an invention of a young man. Unwilling to pay a fair price for the model, he employs the adventuress, who is in love with him, to get the coveted article, promising to marry her in case she succeeds. The story is weak in one respect—and that is where the adventuress goes to the young inventor and draws a revolver with the intention of taking the model by force. Even had she been successful in getting the invention out of the house and into the possession of the manufacturer, there was no chance of her "getting away with it." Also, where the sweetheart of the inventor overhears the two plotters she is so palpably and plainly in view of the two that the scene loses all effect. With these two exceptions the story is excellently put on and holds all the way. Carlyle Blackwell, William H. West, Lillian Christy and Mrs. Dunlop all do good work.

"THE FOUNDLING" (Edison), October 18.—This story was written by Harry Furniss and taken in England. Mr. Furniss, who seems to take to photoplay acting like a duck to water, has a prominent part in the play, the leads of which are taken by Marc Macdermott and Miss Nesbitt. There are some fine scenes, typically English backgrounds, among them a coaching trip; another is of a church. The cast, with the exception of the two Edison leaders, is obviously English; they are all good. The picture is a most interesting release.

"RED SAUNDERS' SACRIFICE" (Lubin), October 17.—A Western picture above the average Western. It is a story of an outlaw who by going for a doctor for a sick woman is revealed to the sheriff. There is a fine view where the bandit, looking from his cabin on the hill across the valley, discovers the blazing home of the mother and daughter. Also there is a dramatic moment when the sheriff, come to arrest the outlaw, discovers in the dead woman the sweetheart of his youth. It is all well done.

"A LIMITED DIVORCE" (Biograph), October 17.—Charles Mailes, as the husband who cannot get along with his wife, makes a lot of fun in this half reel. There is an agreement to separate for five weeks, and the husband goes out to celebrate. The wife's brother, portrayed by Ed Dillon, makes up as a foreigner and takes along the wife to follow the husband. They discover the very gay man buried in sand to his neck and being entertained by a quartet of summer bathing girls, one of whom, by the way, is Mabel Normand. The wife contributes her share to the comedy.

"LIKE THE CAT, THEY CAME BACK" (Biograph), October 17.—On the same reel is this other good laughmaker. Trick cigars of the explosive variety are much in evidence. Also the fondness of some policemen for cooks and good things to eat and drink—and smoke—is amusingly portrayed.

"THE JUDGMENT OF THE SEA" (Melies), Oct. 7.—A picture of the seaside. Its heroine is a smuggler's daughter who, through her father's unlawful calling, is left vulnerable to the schemes of a dastardly police officer who, to make things worse, is married. She is saved from him. The scene-making and photography of the offering are lovely and the acting is very natural. There is also a good picture of a man diving from a rowboat into the sea to find the body of the drowned officer.

"THE STRIPED BATHING SUIT" (Pathe), Oct. 17.—Miss Gwendoline Pates and Charles Arling play this laugh-making farce which was very acceptable to a large Broadway audience. The situation comes from the husband's seeing a bathing suit just like his wife's and his comic run along the beach and his ducking, in his endeavor to make sure tickled the audience. Perhaps the last few feet, by accident in questionable taste, might have been as well left out. They can easily be cut off as it is and the rest of the farce is very good.

"AN ELEPHANT ON THEIR HANDS" (Vitagraph), Oct. 16.—The rest of us may be descended from monkeys; but surely this ripping comic is a "Bunnygraph" His elephantship, the leader of the film, is so truly on to the game and so serious in his part that he reminds us of our old friend and, in such a picture, nothing could be better. Mr. Goodsport, played as George Ober can play, is in that whoop-la, mellow frame of mind that leads a man to buy an elephant, and Goodsport then takes it home. They go to bed together; but the elephant occupies all the bed and wants all the covers. Goodsport would have been content; but his wife (Kate Price), who with some friends had taken refuge in the garret objects and, through the window, rouses the neighborhood. But even when the sheriff had been called and the elephant had been got downstairs, he wouldn't go out, not while the kitchen smelt so good. Gene Mullin wrote the sketch and has given us something good for the blues. Frederick Thomson has ably produced it. Flora Finch, Lillian Walker, Robert Gaillard and Charles Eldridge add their part to the happy, general result.

"MISSING LOCKET" (Eclipse), Oct. 16.—It was two little children who mixed the lockets. The suspicious husband notices his wife's locket in the hands of a stranger, the father of the other little girl. A great deal of trouble ensues with a last act that suggests Othello's jealousy. It makes a good offering, for it is well acted and there are some very prettily photographed scenes.

"PAYING THE BOARD BILL" (Kalem), Oct. 16.—A new landlady gives freshness to this old situation; but is so human anyway that it isn't likely to grow stale; too many bohemian young men have been found in the same kind of a pickle for that. This Kalem picture is a good, light offering. It made the audience laugh and kept it in good humor.

"CENTRAL PARK" (Kalem), Oct. 16.—Very fair views of the more important points in the city's pleasure ground. Central Park has been called "the emerald on the finger of Manhattan." No general view of it, taken from one of the tall buildings near by has ever been shown. This seems strange.

"WHERE LOVE IS GOD IS ALSO" (Selig), Oct. 17.—Tolstoy has been able in several of his short stories to give, dramatically, pictures of religious ideas at work in human consciousness. He takes for his situation the conditions that help some simple Russian peasant to grasp a Gospel truth so strongly that he lives up to it and makes the result of this into a story. This picture attempts the same thing with much success. It isn't a drama; it is nothing more nor less than a sermon; but, by whatever name we call it, it is effective. It might have been made more effective; for occasionally what we see is merely acting, the illusion that it is life passes. The old shoemaker is well played by Frank Weed; but it would take marvelously subtile art to satisfy the part. Joseph Ransome plays his old friend; T. J. Commerford, the fainting man he helps. Winnifred Greenwood plays the poor woman; Lyllian Leighton, the apple woman and Timmy Sheean, the thief. Hattie Gray Baker prepared the scenario, which was produced by Oscar Eagle.

"REMOVING SUNKEN VESSELS" (Edison), Oct. 16.—Shows the operations of a wrecking company whose business it is to remove old hulks. An interesting offering, photographed on the New England Coast.

"LIKE KNIGHTS OF OLD" (Edison), Oct. 16.—A little dream fantasy of light texture but very well done. In Edna Flugrath's dream an old painting comes to life and in old time dress and settings she finds herself his lady. His treatment of her is so tyrannous that it quite spoils her romantic ideal of knighthood. Charles Ogle plays the knight and Augustus Phillips her present-day lover and in the dream the headsman. It gets across on its cleverness, which keeps one interested, and on its prettiness.

"THE OPIUM SMUGGLERS" (Selig), Oct. 15.—Many producers get "fresh" backgrounds by taking different views of the same general locality. In this picture's setting there is a distinct note of freshness. It tells a story of the border between Montana and Canada and was apparently taken on the spot; we don't see the everlasting beach with the fishermen and the fisher lass. William Duncan plays the lead as one of the U. S. border riders, and his capture of the opium smugglers and the peculiar tangle that it gets him in makes the picture. The love story is secondary and is used as relief. Myrtle Stedman plays the woman, just an ordinary, but plucky woman who lives on the Canadian side. We were glad to meet her. The revenue man loves her and so does the leading smuggler (Lester Cunio) and when, after the plan to get the opium across has been cleverly discovered, and the smuggler, after wounding the revenue man, is killed, the second smuggler (Rex de Rosselli) makes the girl think that the officer has murdered him. She gets him across the line with a view to having him arrested by the mounted police and this brings the story to a dramatic climax. It is a very good picture and will make an excellent offering. The author and producer has done a worthy piece of work.

"GENTLEMAN JOE" (Lubin), Oct. 15.—A burglar story with enough freshness to make a fair commercial offering. It fails to convince strongly; but is pretty well presented.

"THE LASS OF GLOUCESTER" (Pathe), Oct. 16.—The fisher folk who appear in this picture get over very well and the love story, though not new at all, is acceptable. The fact that the hero was played by a man too old for the part markedly weakens the impression. The ways he takes to show his love would have been fine in a lad of eighteen; but were rather displeasing in the older character. There was a woman somewhere back in the house who seemed to want to "pan" the offering, and the producer we must admit gave her one or two chances. The audience, as a whole, seemed to like the picture, ignoring the scornful laughter. This was because of the heroine's part, which was pleasingly filled and carried it over. It is dangerous for a producer to let any one at all have any chance to make fun of his serious work. Where the picture is weak throughout, one person can set a big audience guying it; we have enjoyed unintended comedies of this kind. This isn't one though.

"THE CONVERTIBLE AUTO" (C. G. P. C.), Oct. 18.—Trick pictures, drawn by an artist, in series. They will amuse the younger portion of an audience especially.

"THE RUBBER INDUSTRY IN MALAYSIA" (C. G. P. C.), Oct. 18.—An interesting educational and scenic picture, showing the razing of the forest, the planting of the trees, and the gathering of the sap and the shipping of the raw product.

"THE RIVAL ENGINEERS" (Kalem), Oct. 19.—Another Kalem railroad story, containing some situations that may be described as exciting. One particularly is the race between two engines for a switch. There is a supposed collision, the only part the audience seeing, of course, being a flash of steam.

"THE WARNING" (Essanay), Oct. 18.—This is not a pleasant picture. Mr. Bushman, who has the lead, is represented in the opening as traveling the pace that kills. He receives several warnings, first a scimeter, then a noose of the hangman's sort, and then the warning diminishes in its sinister aspect and takes the form of a pair of handcuffs. They are unreal.

"A SOLDIER'S DUTY" (Edison), Oct. 19.—A story of the Civil War. It is not up to the usual Edison standard. It is said that "all's fair in war." But there will be many who see this picture who must feel that a commanding officer who will compel a subordinate to visit his sweetheart, the daughter of a Confederate commander, to carry false information and take pains to be captured, is assuming a position that cannot be described as conduct becoming an officer and a gentleman. Neither would a Confederate commander lead several companies of troops through a wooded country, without flankers or advance guard, and invite an inevitable ambush. The acting is of the best, as it is sure to be when Mr. Lessey and Miss McCoy are in the cast. Others who do good work are Augustus Phillips, Wadsworth Harris and Harry Linson.

"A MISTAKE IN SPELLING" (Vitagraph), Oct. 19.—Pretty comedy-drama in which Mr. Costello and Miss Young have the leads. Mr. Costello, starting on a business trip to Europe, sends telegrams en route to New York assuring the young woman of his love. In the city just before boarding the steamer he sends another which an error makes read "I leave you forever." The comedy comes when a messenger boy wakes Kate Price and gets her out of bed at 1.30 A. M., in order that the fiancee be assured that the man still loves her. Of course the fiancee is very much depressed at the receipt of the wrong message, but all is happily straightened out at the end of the trip.

"MISLEADING EVIDENCE" (Pathe), Oct. 19.—The Western Pathe Company does good work in this picture. The story well may have been written around an idea—that wherein the camera is concealed in the bushes, in order to reveal the moonshiner—but it has been well done. George Gebhart has the part of a sheriff who is in love with the girl who has won the affections of the agent sent to catch the illicit distillers. Through jealousy the sheriff sends the girl to the tree covered by the camera, and of course she steps on the bulb and appears in the photograph. His part is of course the unpopular one, but he does his work well and convincingly. The young woman in the picture is pleasing and makes a distinct success. The father of the girl and the agent make the most of their roles.

"THE GEISHA GIRLS OF JAPAN" (Selig), Oct. 18.—A series of pretty pictures, containing views of dancing girls, canals, flower gardens; one particularly effective scene is that of children dancing. The sub-title said they were 11 years old. There was one, about half that age, who acted like a veteran. The children were imitating older people engaged in a rustic dance. They created much amusement.

"SUBTERFUGE" (Selig), Oct. 18.—We have been surfeited with all sorts of silly contests for the hand of "the girl," but this one seems to have reached the limit. The "heroine" tells the two young men, "I will marry the one who catches the largest trout before 3 o'clock." She didn't. She weighted the smaller fish so as to make the scales proclaim it the larger. Perhaps the Japanese scenes on the other half of the film will carry this so-called comedy.

"THE OUTLAW'S SACRIFICE" (Essanay), Oct. 18.—Good Western. There is a sheriff, a Mexican and an outlaw. Arthur Mackley portrays the first, William Todd the second and True Boardman the last. Julia Mackley plays the sheriff's wife. The outlaw shoots the marauding Mexican and saves the life of the sheriff's wife when the cabin burns.

"BUNNY ALL AT SEA" (Vitagraph), Oct. 19.—The writer has awaited the appearance of this picture with much interest, stimulated, he will confess, by listening to a recital of the history of the picture—from the lips of the comedian. The film is the first of the Bunny abroad pictures, taken when the jovial funny man was on his way to England to secure the Pickwick series. It will make much laughter—there's no doubt of that.

One feature of this picture which is novel and unusual is the fact that but one professional actor appears in it. This does not militate against the interest of the film. Understanding it, it distinctly adds to the interest. The work of some of the cast will bear comparison with the acting of the real article. Especially is this the case with the three friends. Likewise one or two of the women. In the cast appears the captain of the Berlin, the boatswain, the entire ship's band, several of the crew, some of the steerage passengers, three of the men cabin passengers and a quartette of the women passengers.

As the comedy opens Bunny appears on the deck of the ship, disconsolate as he observes the attention that is bestowed by the women on the captain and the unconcern with which they gaze over his own head. He surreptitiously secures a uniform coat and cap from the captain's cabin and dons them. His fortunes change. He strolls up the deck with a woman on each arm. The captain from his cabin window calls the boatswain, and Bunny is placed under arrest. Then he is made to swab the deck, to peel onions and potatoes, and other menial work. He is finally released and restored to good standing. The last scene is on the deck, where Bunny is surrounded by a dozen of his friends. The best of the comedy comes right here. One by one they hastily depart. Mal de mer is responsible. Bunny is the last to succumb; he fights hard, but it is no use.

"THE SPORTING EDITOR" (Lubin), Oct. 19.—There is truly a something in baseball that is like nature, it makes kin of everybody on the bleachers, and the Lubin people have cleverly used this to make a picture. Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe play the leads in the nominally newspaper story in which all the good scenes are at the game. The first is a newspaper sporting editor, hater of all women, but especially of the second, the editor of the women's page. He has to take her to a baseball game and the romantic comedy begins. This part of the picture seemed to be thoroughly enjoyed.

"CAUGHT BLUFFING" (Lubin), Oct. 19.—On the same reel this farcical picture gave a good deal of amusement. There is little to be said for the situation; but much for the way it was handled. It is a good comic offering and a laugh-maker.

"FOUR DAYS A WIDOW" (Vitagraph), Oct. 21.—A married-life comedy in which a young wife leads her husband, who has planned to have a gay time on a business (?) trip, a pretty dance. Lillian Walker and Roger Lytton play the leads with Evelyn Francis in an important role as the wife's friend. The picture affords pleasing though light entertainment; for although the situation is a bit screen-worn, the pretty sets and light-hearted acting get it over.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY, No. 43," Oct. 21.—The opening item shows a big county fair in Montana in which Indian farmers exhibit their prize pumpkins and other products. It is one of the most interesting items we have seen in some time. There is an especially fine portrait of Emperor William, taken at Berne, in Switzerland, and also one of the ex-Sultan of Morocco, whom Monsieur Pathe is showing about the big plant of the Pathe Freres in Paris. All items are good.

"THE ONE SHE LOVED" (Biograph), Oct. 21.—A very pleasant picture to review, because of its substantial humanity and its great beauty. In it, once again the Biograph producer, whom everybody knows is Mr. Griffith, has succeeded in picturing something that seems to be finer and sweeter than words. The best scenes of it are also a great personal triumph for Little Mary. She plays the part of a young wife and mother with Henry Walthall in the part of the husband, and with a very good-natured, healthy baby as their child. The situation comes when the wife, from her viewpoint, has cause to be jealous of her husband's stenographer, a contrasting character which subtilly effects the impression. The first touch of jealousy, which only needs an explanation and is brushed away, gives this talented player a chance to show conjugal affection which shines through her pretty face like May sunlight. Her personal beauty and charm are to her, in this scene, as a Stradivarius to a master violinist; for she too makes music with them. A little later, that goosie, the stenographer, again makes her jealous. This also only needs an explanation; but the young wife doesn't know that and doesn't wait for it. For a few hours, tragedy hovers over the family; but it is all cleared in the end. A lovely picture and a most desirable release.

"THE SPIRIT OF THE RANGE" (Vitagraph), Oct. 22.—Good Western drama. Miss Mary Charleson upholds her reputation in this picture and does some of her usual good work. Robert Burns has the part of the foreman of a ranch; he is snubbed by the young woman, but after he has saved her life she is forced to change her attitude. Fred Burns also has a prominent part.

"THE LION TAMER'S REVENGE" (Cines), Oct. 21.—This two-reel special is a tale of the circus, and the principal parts are taken by show people. This of course adds to the sensational possibilities, but it cannot be expected that a tamer of lions will rise to dramatic heights. The climax is a situation of horror, made so not through the real action, but through suggestion.

"ASCOLI PICENO, SOUTH ITALY" (Cines), Oct. 22. A very interesting scenic, containing pictures of an old town; also views of lime quarries and scenes descriptive of the marketing of the product.

"THE INVITED GUEST" (Cines), Oct. 22.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this comedy featuring Mr. Gambardelli. The comedian is all right, but he is unfortunate in the part he is given to portray. That is as a guest in a house in which two mischievous children are given full swing. There are many parents who believe it is a serious mistake to lionize youngsters who put water cones in the coat pockets of a guest, to tie his leg to a chair, and to do other equally foolish things.

"THE SNARE" (Essanay), October 17.—The part that a spy plays in war and the part that a detective plays in the closely analogous situation in social life have much in common. The work that both do is necessary and worthy of high praise when done in the right spirit; but the means used, under other circumstances, would seem contemptible. When one sees, in any picture, a pretty lady detective brazenly winning the confidence of a criminal's old mother solely to betray it, he has to do some deep thinking in a hurry before he can wholly sympathize with it; he has greatly to despise the criminal before the sympathy will come. If he doesn't sympathize with it, he has to condone the criminal, which is revolting to the normal mind. To picture the lady detective at work compels the normal mind to sympathize with her. If the producer's object is to picture the turmoil in a young detective's heart, doing her harsh work for the first time, he can safely picture her as revolting at the means she uses and whatever comes of it, we, at least, have a wholesome picture. The producer of "The Snare" hasn't centered his interest in the detective's heart nor does he permit us to sympathize with the criminal, for we don't know that he is not guilty and surely the detective thinks him guilty since he is in hiding. He makes the lady revolt from her business and help the criminal and then begs the question by proving the man innocent. It is a picture that asks our sympathy, but leaves us no one to sympathize with, and though well produced and cleverly acted it is not a strong offering. Lily Branscombe plays the old mother; Wm. Bailey, her son; Beverly Bayne, the lady on the case; Frank Dayton, E. H. Calvert, Chas. Hitchcock and Wm. Mason are detectives. Howard Missimer is the telegraph operator who brings the news that the man is not guilty, and Whitney Raymond is the boy in the detective agency.

"THE MAVERICK" (Solax), October 18.—The story deals with a young woman who fell into the clutches of two sharpers and who was used as a decoy to trap a Westerner. The girl escaped and sought out the man who had been robbed and helped him to regain his money. The two fell in love and decided that the West was the best place to live.

"THE WOMAN IN WHITE" (Thanhouser), October 20.—These two reels from the novel by Wilkie Collins are well done. They are handled in the careful manner so characteristic of Thanhouser specials. There are many fine scenes, both interiors and exteriors, revealing artistic selection. The acting is well directed and executed. There are strong situations aplenty. In fact, it is a good picture all the way.

"GAUMONT WEEKLY," October 16.—An unusually interesting number. Some of the best views are of the celebration of the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of Erasmus Hall, Brooklyn, now a mixed high school; the recent demonstration by those interested in fire prevention in New York City, including a drill by the Fire Department and the emptying of a building of two thousand employees in four minutes; the fire drill at Annapolis; some new toilettes; a tinted picture; a novel motorcycle band, and an impersonation by John M. Keyes of Colonel Roosevelt.

"LOVE AND WAR" (Majestic), October 22.—A good Civil War melodrama.

"THE WAY OF THE TRANSGRESSOR" (American), October 23.—There is much action in this film, but it it not coherent.

"THE WOOERS OF MOUNTAIN KATE" (American), October 24.—A feature of this picture is the introduction of the four principal characters at the opening of the drama, one at a time. There are some fine views of mountain and wood.

"IN A GARDEN" (Thanhouser), October 25.—A simple story, but a charming story. It again demonstrates how effective may be the slightest of themes if effectively—"brainily"—handled. Riley Chamberlain as the gardener tells the story he has seen unfolded within the precincts of a beautiful spot—of the beginning of affection between two, the quarrel, and the reconciliation years afterward.

"ONE, TWO, THREE" (American), October 28.—This is a good comedy. The story is of four men who create a pot for the last unmarried man of the quartet. The money is surrendered when the third man is down. As the winner starts for other scenes to enjoy his sudden income the three losers experience a desire to join him. Each is restrained in most effective fashion. The picture will interest admirers of Jack Richardson as showing him without makeup—revealing a face that is pleasant and altogether good to look upon.

"THE LOTTERY PRIZE" (Great Northern), Nov. 2.—A very clever picture that also is well made. A servant wins a lottery prize. She is given only one-tenth of it; goes shopping (fine views of the shops in a Danish city); is suspected and arrested. The swindling lottery clerk is frightened by seeing the police officer come in with the girl and gives up the rest of what was due her. It is a good picture. The comedies on this split-reel make it a good offering.

"AN UNSUCCESSFUL FLIRTATION" (Great Northern), Nov. 2.—Two mashers get each a trouncing which is truly deserved. It has some extremely well photographed, pretty and interesting city scenes. As a whole, it is not a first class production, yet will give fair entertainment.

"A KENTUCKY FEUD" (Rex), Oct. 24.—One of the distinct advantages pictures have over writing in drawing life is that, no matter what the scenario is, if a different actor plays the situation, a different character is portrayed, true at least, whenever the portrayal is true enough to be human. Different sets and backgrounds also help to make an old situation fresh. The center of fresh interest in this picture is the minister whose earnest desire it is to end the feud in which two brothers are important factors on opposite sides. The value of this preacher's work is not emotionally pictured, it might have been much stronger; but it is a fresh interest. The part a child plays in stopping a feud is always acceptable, the more because a sense of general worth or fitness makes it easy to believe. The little player in this picture is very sweet and pleasing. The whole seems a bit artificial; it will not stir emotions in many; but there is much in it that entertains.

"JUST A WOMAN" (Powers), Oct. 25.—One of the first things that will be noticed in this picture is the care and thought shown in its handling. It deals with criminals and detectives and the maker of the scenario knew what he wanted and knew the materials he needed to work with. The object of the story doesn't rise to the plane of Sheldon's "Salvation Nell"; but its realism suggests that play's best scene. The producer has done his part well and the result is remarkable for the atmosphere of underworld life in New York City. That picture of a dive could hardly have been made better. It is an offering out of the ordinary run and very commendable. Miss Florence Barker plays the lead.

"A DAUGHTER OF THE RED SKINS" (Bison-Universal), Oct. 25.—A soldier and Indian picture in two reels, with the interest centered in an Indian girl, captured as a baby and brought up in the fort as the colonel's ward. Grown to young womanhood she sees her grandfather, a warlike chief, brought a captive, into the fort and is told who he is. She steals away from the fort with a message from her grandfather to the tribesmen that means the death of her white friends, for they were that, and the annihilation of the tribe. While the story, or to be more accurate, much in its situation doesn't seem strongly probable, there are several very sure thrills in it and many fine views, some of them artistic to a degree. The interest is sustained through both reels and it makes an excellent offering.

"BELLA'S BEAUS" (Crystal), Oct. 20.—Pearl White has a large following among picture fans and she deserves to have. This brisk little comedy gets across delightfully on her charm and skill, but she is well supported by four or five men, two of whom, strongly contrasted, are her beaus. It is very humanly played and without artificiality. Surely it is good entertainment.

"ONLY WOMAN IN TOWN" (Crystal), Oct. 20.—There is good laughter in this, too, on the same reel. It's a cowboy boarding-house farce. The proprietor, Widow Chase, is the only woman in town and she can cook. It isn't so human as the foregoing; but, although the scenario made some artificial passages necessary, the producer plainly knows his business and the leading lady, let us quickly add, knows how to act. We don't know her name yet.

"THE ANGEL OF THE STUDIO" (Victor), Oct. 25.—A comedy of character set in a studio building with fashionable apartments for successful artists and garret rooms for others. The daughter of the woman who keeps the house is played by Florence Lawrence; she is the angel, a harum-scarum creature with a woman's heart under her queer costume. She likes very much the shiftless garret artist, played by Owen Moore, and does her best, very successfully, to make things easy for him only to see him fall in love with a swan-like model. The "angel" is one of those parts that Miss Lawrence has created and its value comes from the subtle way that she makes the womanly feelings of the character shine through the awkward exterior of the goosie. It made a good offering, one that will stir sympathies and make laughter.

"CAPTAIN BEN'S YARN" (Majestic), Oct. 20.—Herbert Prior and Mabel Trunelle play the leads in this excellent drama. Captain Ben tells two youngsters, who sit beside him while he is fishing, a remarkable story of deep sea adventure. He loves a girl whose father has chosen another suitor for her; he puts to sea, is captured by pirates, swims three weeks, rides a shark, falls into the clutches of cannibals and finally, returning home, finds his girl married. A note of foolery in old Ben's yarn is very pleasing. As a whole, the production will win many friends.

"STICK IT JOHN" (Lux), Oct. 25.—There is much that is laughable and the action is very spirited in this vigorous little comedy which presents an unfortunate man falling into a barrel of tar thereby causing everything imaginable from feathers to furniture to stick tightly to him. His adventures will keep any play house crowd amused and interested.

"ALL THROUGH A BANK NOTE" (Lux), Oct. 25.—With the above on the same reel is this comedy which swings around a bank note that has been torn in half. The difficulties attending the proper union of the two parts are bound to win a laugh. The idea is commendable for its novelty, and the production is highly finished.

"A COUNTRY SCANDAL" (Gaumont), Oct. 22.—This comedy is full of a subtle humor and a decidedly foreign flavor. A young man and a charming wife, the latter fond of the gay life in Paris, take up their residence in Bretonne, a very provincial town. The burghers there find the young matron very attractive, but the women call her as a town scandal and out of these two viewpoints grows the fun. The situations are extremely well handled and the acting is excellent. The film will meet with much approval among those who have a taste for fine spun humor.

"VICOLLULA FALLS" (Gaumont), Oct. 22.—Following the foregoing on the same reel are these admirable views of the Vicollula Falls at Gadsden, Ala. Some of the scenes are wonderfully beautiful.

"THE OLD PROFESSOR" (Eclair), Oct. 20.—This comedy, full of a subtle humor, portrays the character of an old professor who holds an examination of a candidate for a profession in whom he develops an ulterior interest. The sly manner in which the old scholar examines the young man and leaves him in doubt of the issue is unusually well done. Those who enjoy quiet humor will enjoy this sketch immensely.

"THE SULPHUR INDUSTRY IN SICILY" (Eclair), Oct. 20.—These scenes of the sulphur mines and the reduction of sulphur from the ore follow the above on the same reel and will meet with approval among spectators who like educational subjects.

"LEAVES IN THE STORM" (Rex), Oct. 20.—The acting in this drama of the eternal triangle of husband, wife and "friend of the family" is of excellent quality and the story depends entirely on it for success. The nagging husband, who literally drives his wife out of her home, is an unusually good characterization. The climax is skillfully handled and the suspense well sustained. The wife returning to her husband and finding that their child has died, is herself killed by the shock of the discovery and is found on the child's grave. People with a discriminating taste will appreciate this film. It is a very commendable piece of work.

"BETTY'S BANDIT" (Nestor), Oct. 21.—A drama of the West in which from the circumstantial evidence in finding a jeweled dagger among her admirer's possessions, Betty and her mother are almost convinced that the sweetheart is a dangerous bandit on whose head is set a price of $500. But the suspicions are finally set to rest by the capture of the real bandit and "Betty's Bandit" comes out of the tangle a hero and a fiance. The film is characterized by manly fighting, some gun play and much hard riding. It will meet with strong favor where the Wild West stories have a home.

"THE WOMAN IN WHITE" (Gem), Oct. 22.—Herein is admirably visualized Wilkie Collins' masterpiece of the same title. Sir Percival Glyde, Count Fosco, Laura, the young artist and the mysterious woman in white are well presented, the story is nowhere confusing and lends itself with unusually good effect to the motion picture art. Full justice has been done the weird quality of the story and its most thrilling passages lose none of their strength. Count Fosco's betrayal of his friends, the ghostly appearances of the Woman in White, the uncanny substitution of the latter for Laura, the meeting of Laura and Walter in the cemetery and the death of Glyde after his confession are all faithfully and carefully portrayed. To the thousands who have counted the novel among their favorites, these two reels will be quite a treat. Those who have not read the book will have no trouble in getting the story. The production has feature quality.

"THE SKELETON" (Powers), Oct. 23.—A papier mache skeleton which is very life-like or death-like, perhaps, is the fun maker in this comedy. The "Powers' Kids" use the skeleton to frighten a succession of people including a hobo, two lovers in a canoe, a chicken-stealing negro and a fisherman with much too much "bait." A laugh will go up in any play house where this film is exhibited.

"THE NEW MESSINA" (Powers), Oct. 23.—Following the above on the same reel are these views of the city of Messina in Southern Italy, which was destroyed a few years ago by earthquake and volcanic eruption. We found these views very interesting. They were taken from a moving train.

"THE HOMECOMING" (Eclair), Oct. 22.—This well presented drama of love, sorrow and vengeance throws into the limelight the characters of two men, Tilford and Langdon, the latter suffering for a crime of the former and vowing revenge for the injustice dealt him. After serving ten years in prison opportunity comes for vengeance. But, meanwhile, Langdon has married Tilford's daughter and their child, a girl of five, prevents the tragedy. The scene in which this occurs will command attention, and while the theme is not altogether new it has many novel turns to recommend it. The photography is praiseworthy.

"HUNTED DOWN" (Bison-Universal), Oct. 22.—This drama, which swings around a detective's pursuit of a criminal and his accomplice, a woman, has a sensational opening. It begins with a view of the murdered man at a card table and his murderers hastening to make a "get away" to the West, where the man turns cowboy. He is traced and finally captured by the detective, who then easily arrests the woman. The scene of the capture and the detective's pretense of being shot which marks it is one of strong interest and good dramatic quality. The film merits approval particularly among those fond of detective lore.

"THE BORDER PARSON" (Nestor), Oct. 23.—There is a virile, gripping interest in this high-tension drama of the Far West. It pictures a parson from the effete East intervening to save a drunken hotel keeper from bringing destruction on his family. An admirably portrayed bad man enters in to heighten the dramatic quality. Events have been carefully selected to tell the story clearly and convincingly and the climax, unusually strong, evolves with commendable naturalness. The film will enjoy a wide popularity.

"MAKING UNCLE JEALOUS" (Eclair), Oct. 24.—Uncle in this light, amusing comedy very properly grows violently jealous of a mysterious Mexican. He has been delaying for too many years a proposal to a very sweet old lady. The Mexican is only a masquerade assumed by a young man in love with one of Uncle's pretty nieces. A second young man, in love with another of Uncle's nieces, is his accomplice. In the end, three happy couples laugh over the whole escapade and all who view them will laugh with them.

"THE LADY BARBER OF ROARING GULCH" (Nestor), Oct. 25.—The idea of a pretty woman shaving the male population of a small town has always been inherently funny. In this comedy it has been worked out to good advantage, the tonsorial artiste in question makes all the ladies of Roaring Gulch jealous and thereby unconsciously promotes many matches which have been hanging fire. The climax, when the lady's husband appears, will meet with much laughter, as will the waiting line before the barber shop. The fun throughout is actively presented.

"THY WILL BE DONE" (Champion), Oct. 21.—Two spectacular accidents, one of a bank of earth caving in and the other of the collapse of a porch railing, punctuate this drama with two startling surprises and give added spice to a good story. By the first accident the junior of two partners, gold seekers, becomes the girl's guardian and finds a fortune both for himself and her. After some years in a seminary in the East she marries a man who afterwards develops criminal traits. The guardian, who secretly loves her, stands between her and the worst results of her mis-marriage. Finally, by the second accident, she is freed of the encumbrance and marries her guardian. The film is characterized by interesting settings throughout and holds the interest.

"THE PICKANINNIES AND THE WATERMELON" (Imp), Oct. 21.—There are only two whites and very many colored folks in this comedy of watermelons. It furnishes some unusually good humor when, after much longing and plotting, an old parson and sundry numbers of his flock manage to get the pick of a load of watermelons by the clever ruse of putting a pickaninny in a sack and gaining a place for him on the watermelon wagon. The picture of a great crowd of the negroes ravenously devouring the stolen fruit is a happy final touch. The homely atmosphere and sly humor running through the whole are sure to win many friends for this film.

"CHIQUITA, THE DANCER" (American), Oct. 30.—A typical Western melodrama dealing with rather rough people and their rough doings, but fairly effective, because it wastes no time in getting down to business. It is played by one of the second Flying A companies.

"A DOMESTIC TREASURE" (Gaumont), Oct. 29.—A hand-colored film giving a pretty romantic comedy of about 1830. The sets are tastefully made interiors, rooms in the home of country folk of some means, kitchen and dining room for the most part. It is amusing in a quiet way, not a laugh-maker until the closing scenes.

"GORGES OF ALBUQUERQUE" (Gaumont), Oct. 29.—This very short scenic is also hand-colored. It shows a stream of water in its rocky glen.

"THE IDOL WORSHIPER" (Solax), Oct. 25.—The Solax producer knows the value of pretty girls in a picture. For this picture, he has conceived of a girl so wrapped up in the idols of her story books that she can see nothing attractive in live men. Blanche Cornwall plays this miss and Darwin Karr is the man suing for her hand. The comedy takes a fresher path than usual in the working out of the scheme it employs to bring the girl to sensible terms. It is the girl's dad, Lee Beggs, who proposes the scheme, and when she has promised to marry the man who will save her invalid father from the fake house-afire, a Chinaman, Billy Quirk, is the hero. Yet even for a farce it is unconvincing in the parts where it ought to convince that though it will make some laughs, they will be fewer than in the best comedies.

"A WIRELESS MIRACLE" (Reliance), Oct. 25.—An interesting romance with a fresh situation. It is set on a light-house island in the Great Lakes. A wireless telegraph has been installed and the old light keeper dislikes having it there. But the keeper's little girl gets sick with diphtheria and no doctor is at hand. The wireless operator gets into conversation with a famous specialist on board a passing ship and this physician dictates treatment to the folk isolated on the island. This treatment necessitates an operation on the child's throat which is done with a razor which will make any physician's flesh creep.

"THE MULE RANCH MYSTERY" (Comet), Oct. 26.—Excellent photographs of a large and very lively mule market with some lovely views of rural scenes help this picture, which tells its story speedily and with a good deal of naturalness. The situation in which the badman on the ranch steals from the owner and fixes things so that the trusted foreman, in love with the ranch girl, will seem guilty, is old. Still, this can be said for it, that it is full of the quality proved to be popular many times.

"TAKING CARE OF THE BABY" (Thanhouser), Oct. 27.—A thoroughly delightful comedy. Turning out dandy pictures is a rule with Thanhouser, not an exception; but this one is an exceptionally good picture. In its way it is a wonder. But the humor in experiences of that marvelously lucky baby will without any doubt fetch the truest and best kind of laughter. It's the kind of offering that will get many recalls. We believe that every human being who sees it will want to see it again.

"THE WANDERER" (American), Oct. 3.—The Flying A premier company plays another ranch story with a good deal of outward difference from and a good deal of inward similarity to other stories with this trade mark. Richardson is in his usual role of trouble-maker; Kerrigan is the wanderer who is given a job on the farm. There is good, substantial humanity in it, very well acted by these competent players and, if it has a groundwork like other offerings, the building on this is new and seems worth while. It is a good entertainer, a commendable release.

"THE TREE IMP" (Majestic), Oct. 27.—Mabel Trunnelle plays the "tree imp" a strange girl whom the city artist (Herbert Prior), out sketching comes across and falls in love with. The city man's friends make fun of her and this gives Miss Trunnelle a good chance to put an effective human touch into the character that makes a convincing love story. Anna Lehr plays the role of city girl who also loves, but vainly, the artist. The backgrounds are very pretty indeed.

"PUT YOURSELF IN HIS PLACE" (Thanhouser), Oct. 29.—Reade's "Put Yourself in His Place" has action, the kind that is tempting to film makers, and has been done before in pictures, but never so well done as this. The Moving Picture World has already reviewer it at length. We have pointed out its beauty and need, at this time, only remind our readers that it is a very desirable offering. That Thanhouser Kid is a player.

"MEN WHO DARE" (Reliance), Oct. 30.—The hero of this picture, a physician, dared to try to "break the system" and bring some humanity into the handling of convicts, in a prison under his medical care. Yet he is not the picture's center of interest, although, perhaps, the scenario writer intended him to be. The heroine, wife of one of the convicts, whom in the first reel we had seen as a man of refinement, is played by Miss Gertrude Robinson. She has a very emotional part, just the role that fits her and she puts so much convincing art into her portrayal that the picture's real interest begins and ends with her. The scenes that show the brutality of the prison are also very strong and we sympathize with the doctor who puts his position in jeopardy to bring about better conditions there. It's a well rounded picture that reflects credit on its author, Forrest Halsey.

Projection Department

Edited by F. H. RICHARDSON

From Far-Off Australia.

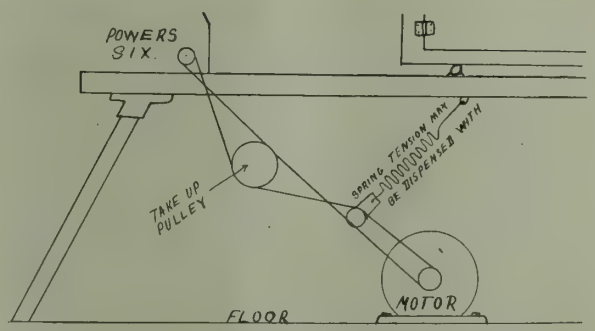
MR. P. FULTON PRESTON, Kalgoovlie, Western Australia, contributes the following very interesting letter. I have given it space, though very long, because I believe the words of a brother operator in a far-off land will prove both interesting and agreeable to our readers. The letter runs thus:

Out in this corner of our planet we get The Moving Picture World, and right off I want to know whether or not you can supply back copies to complete our files? I find The World most useful, instructive, and, at times, amusing. Perhaps a few particulars of my own operating room and apparatus may be of interest.

We recently installed Power's "Six" projector in place of an English model Pathe. We are now showing an indoor 23-foot picture at 92 feet; current 30 to 35 amperes at about 65 volts d.c., through Westinghouse M.G. set, 440 volt to 80 volt; capacity 80 amperes. Speaking of motor-generator sets, and more especially of commutators, I am an E. E. and have had considerable experience with these latter, under widely varying conditions. I find that most grades of carbon brushes cause a deposit on the commutator, which is productive of heavy sparking, good brushes being extremely rare—out here at any rate. A good commutator cleaning compound, which I have had in use for years, and which has no effect on the insulation, may be made as follows: Sulphuric Ether 20 fluid ounces, dissolve ½ oz. stearin and add 20 ozs. "Vacuum Light Machine Oil," then add 2 ozs. wood alcohol and 4 ozs. gasoline. Lastly add about ½ oz. turpentine. Apply this on a piece of thick piano felt while motor or dynamo, as case may be, is running. Give it the merest dampening only and then polish commutator with a ball of paper, changing the latter as it becomes dirty. There is absolutely nothing to equal paper for the purpose. Clean the felt occasionally with benzine.

Should it become necessary to true up the commutator of the motor of a d.c. motor-generator set (and occasionally, say every six months, this should be done, even though it may feel and look all right), it may be done with a suitable, broad, single-cut fine file. Lift motor brushes entirely clear of commutator and wedge an oily rag in contact with commutator underneath, same to bear only lightly. If you use a double-throw switch, as I think every operator should, to switch to direct resistance off the mains in case of accident to M.G. set, join up, by strips of metal, the generator contact, or switch, with center arc contacts. Put a small resistance; say one which will pass 20 amperes on your line voltage, in circuit. Separate your carbons so they do not touch. Make sure your generator field is excited and then throw switch over to resistance contacts and the generator will run as a motor, thus enabling you to true up the motor commutator. This is my own procedure every little while. It is quite satisfactory. I have even rigged a tool clamp and rest and turned up the motor commutator when very badly burned. With, say, 20 amperes switched from 220 v. mains to an 80 v. generator it is possible to bring the armature to rest merely by friction of the hand on the smooth coupling. It is therefore apparent that even though the armatures speed up pretty high there need be no alarm felt. However, racing may be avoided by a helper applying friction to the coupling or manipulating the switch.

And now I wish to say a word in praise of Power's "Six" projector. Using precisely the same lenses, arc., etc., as with the old machine, merely changing one mechanism for the other, I find for the same lighting results on the screen I can reduce from 50 amperes on Pathe to 30 on Power's, both machines lined up to a hair and in perfect order. The shutter on Power's accounts for some of this no doubt, the constant optical axis probably contributing also. Can you suggest any other reasonable cause for this? I have mounted the Power's on a "Kinemacolor" stand which we cannot use otherwise. This part of our universe is, I think, absolutely without exception, the worst I have struck with regard to the high standard of perfection of projection demanded by the public. They are, in a word, hypercritical; but give ear and interpretation of what I now have to tell ye wise men of all nations. Kinemacolor, the right for which our house acquired at a stiff figure, ran as a novelty only five weeks. It isn't good enough for them yet; they object to the brilliant coloring and to the constant recurrence of the scarlet of the British army uniform. With the exception of some of the best of scenic subjects they were positively disliked by anything up to 80 or 90 per cent. of the audiences. Many complained of eye trouble. There was nothing wrong with the light. We were using anything from 90 to 130 amperes for an 18-foot picture. The colors were perfect and the filters accurately adjusted; in fact, everything was about O. K. In Perth and Fremantle the same result. Had to take it off. Is there any accounting for taste? Reverting to Power's again, ours is evidently one of the early models as it is not fitted for motor drive, and as I do not believe in driving from the flywheel when situated as it is in Power's, I had to cast around for something better. The enclosed sketch will explain. Belt must be as slack as possible.



Even with an enormous amount of slack the slip on machine, motor and pulley is hardly noticeable. I use a variable series resistance in armature circuit of motor. With this I can string 1,000 feet out to 24 minutes if necessary or run it at any faster speed up to danger point. In short it works real fine, especially on the take up, winding quite tight and even.

In regard to motor drive in general: It is nearly fourteen years since I first handled bio work, and for the last eight of these I have always used motor drives. My first was fitted to an old Lumiere and, in turn, to an Edison, Lubin, Empire, French Gaumont, Bond (an Australian make), Paul, Cinematograph, Pathe and now Power's. I have heard it complained of, especially when using heavy motors, by others who have even comparatively lately tried motor drive out here, that they cannot stop anything like quickly enough in case of a break or other accident. My own method may interest, as by it no trouble can arise, either to burn out the motor or in its regulation. The motor is, say, to be used on 220 volts. I wind it for about 130 to, say, 150, and mount with a switch and fuse in series with each of the two circuits, armature and field (separate circuits in parallel). I arrange a small lamp resistance in series with each circuit; say three lamps in parallel for field, containing one each, 32, 16 and 8 carbon filament lamps, and four in parallel for armature taking one each, 32, 16 and 8 lamps, 220 volts, each on switch holder for selection of lamps and thus regulation of current; small resistance (variable sliding contact) being included in the armature circuit of No. 26 S.W.G. wire. A third switch is arranged to short circuit the armature through the lamps, in series with it outside the fuse, and by the use of this as an emergency switch, the machine may be stopped in about 4 to 6 pictures easily, with no harmful strain on the motor. My own is thus arranged and has done about 3,000 hours' running. It is still as good as ever, and has only had one new pair of brushes and one pair of new bearings. It originally drove a 12-inch desk fan and was rewound for this work.

Aluminum Screens.

Grove City, Pa., writes:

In a recent issue of The World I notice your comments on my letter regarding aluminum screens, and I would now like to say a word further. I am not able to locate the issue of The World referred to, but I see now that I misconstrued the sense in which you described a curtain as having a matt or pebbled surface, and supposed of course you referred to a certain curtain, a sample of which I am sending and which you will note has a peculiar surface, evidently produced in the same manner as the surface of artificial leather. Aluminum screens, to be practical for projection purposes, must be free from all glaring effect and must have what you would call a dead flat surface instead of a shiny surface. Aluminum paint applied to most any surface will, when illuminated with light projected from a single source, as in the case of a moving picture machine, show defects or irregularities of illumination, which in turn are responsible for the seeming haze and the glare so common to many screens. The aluminum itself is not to blame for this. The fault lies in the medium or oil with which it is applied. Certain oils, commonly used, will dry unevenly, and with a slight gloss in spots. Apply a coat of gloss paint on a board which has been unevenly primed, or filled, and you will notice that in spots the paint will dry with a perfectly dead finish, while in other places there is a gloss. Aluminum itself does not oxidize or tarnish easily, and a properly made screen should last a long time without deteriorating in any way. I don't have screens, formulas or any other sort of curtain dope for sale and don't intend to go into the business. I believe the Projection Department is maintained for the purpose of an exchange of ideas among the fraternity and for the betterment of projection generally. Screens are just as important as arc lamps, or any other part of the equipment, and lately have been the least discussed. I for one would like to see some of the other fellows who write for the Department cut loose on the screen proposition. I have taken up the matter because I am myself getting good results from an aluminum coated screen, while all the Department writers seem to have more or less of a tendency to condemn the aluminum surface. This, however, may not be altogether without reason, since they have not seen the right kind of an aluminum screen. Many exhibitors are using screens for which they pay fancy prices, the coating of which is nothing but aluminum, if they only knew it. I note that you say you will have to be "shown," and I don't blame you for that. I enclose a piece of the screen I referred to in my last letter and as soon as I get the time to do it I will make a good sized sample of the one I am using and send it to you—not a small piece, a few inches square, but as large a screen as I can conveniently mount and express to you.

You are perfectly correct, Grove City, in saying that an aluminum screen with a flat surface must have a dead, dull surface. Such a screen would have the same efficiency as one with a matte surface, or nearly so, though I believe the matte or pebbled surface is best and most practical. By matte I mean a slightly rough or broken surface. The perfectly smooth, polished surface is not practical for a screen, for reasons unnecessary to set forth at length. The sample submitted seems to be an excellent projection surface, though apparently it is aluminum, pure and simple, and I don't think it contains anything else; therefore if it is aluminum and is advertised as something else, the advertising is not honest. Moreover that kind of advertising is unnecessary. You are correct in assuming the Projection Department to be a forum for the exchange of ideas. That is precisely what it is, and ideas of any and all kinds are welcome, provided they seem to be of value to the business as a whole. I hardly think it would be worth while to go to the expense of sending me a large sample unless the screen is intended to be placed on sale, though of course, we shall carefully examine it if it is forwarded. I shall be glad to have screen discussion but must insist that writers on this topic stick to facts they know or have every reason to believe to be true. I shall have an article from the Mirror Screen Company very soon and I expect it to deal with the whole screen question quite fully.

Some Ideas.

Langdon, N. D., sends in the following:

I have some ideas to submit which may interest others. Have arranged an 8 c.p. lamp on a swinging wall bracket directly in front of the objective lens of my Motiograph. It swings to a position between the two lenses when the film is threaded up. Have also scratched the enamel off of the machine head next to the aperture plate and find it works well, though not quite as satisfactory as the lamp. The makers of the different machines could stripe their lines with gold and it would be a useful feature. There is so little room between the lens and wall of my machine that it is rather inconvenient to swing the wall bracket, so I am now installing a small 4 c.p. lamp, on battery current, inside the machine head; the same being operated by switch on machine base. I use an outside shutter, of course. This same could be easily installed on an Edison. Speaking of outside shutters, I took your advice and sent for one. Its wide blade proved to be too narrow, but adding pieces to each edge overcame the travel ghost effect, though it did not overcome the flicker. I worked a week on this problem, and succeeded in getting a shutter which produced an absolutely flickerless picture. I won't pass this information along as I expect to make some money out of it. Will you kindly give me the shutter shaft diameters of the different makes of machines? I also made a film cleaning block by using two pieces of 2 x 4, with a spike fastened to side of upper block, the same sliding up and down in staples driven into the lower block, the surfaces being covered with heavy outing-flannel, tacked to the block at one end. This flannel is changed for each film. I put a roller at end of the block, the whole thing being mounted on a piece of plank so arranged that it can be taken out during the afternoon for film inspection. I use just enough wood alcohol to moisten film surface lightly. Rewinding through this block does lots of good—just once through. As wood alcohol dries the glycerine in the emulsion I only use it on films which are quite dirty. And now one more stunt: There is no day current here, so I have no chance to run the films through and repair them before the show. I therefore run them through the old Edison during the afternoon, with the lens pointing toward the window. This makes it easy to detect misframes by looking through the picture in the aperture; also sprocketed places. If a film seems to be much sprocketed though, it is not safe. It will go through the Edison O. K., with its short tension springs, where it would tear on the Motiograph. We therefore run such films on the Motiograph. If the torn sprockets hold once, they will probably hold again. I throw in a piece of paper at the patches, and in rewinding I find the patch near the paper. With reference to the shutter, I have a design I never heard of before, which can be adjusted to suit different installations. Can be readily used as outside shutter, and as inside shutter fairly well too. Would you advise me to manufacture and sell direct, outright to manufacturers, or sell the directions for making it? It is positively 50 per cent. better than the common three wing outside shutter and lighter too.

I have published this letter practically just as it was written to show you what the editor has to contend with. This brother is an exhibitor and has contributed to the Department a number of times, but I want to impress upon him and upon my other friends that I have to do a great deal of guessing unless things are set forth very clearly. Now I am going to comment on this letter and I don't want Langdon to feel very angry or hurt. I am doing it not only for his benefit, but for the benefit of all concerned. Langdon says that he is installing an 8 c.p. lamp on a swinging wall bracket directly in front of the projection lens, and follows that by saying that this lamp swings in position between the two lenses when the film is threaded up. Now I doped all that out this way: (1) That the lamp is to allow him to look through the objective lens, from the aperture plate side, when he is threading up, and that, after the threading is done, the lamp swings to the left to position between the objective lens and the stereopticon lens, where it is out of the way. Langdon says he has also scratched the enamel off the machine head next to the aperture plate, and finds it works well, though not so satisfactory as the lamp. Now exactly what Langdon means by this I cannot even guess. What connection there would be between scratching the enamel off the machine head beside the aperture plate, and a lamp out in front of the objective lens, I fail to see. Therefore Langdon will please come across with further data. Langdon says the makers of different machines could "stripe these lines with gold and it would be a useful feature." What lines are you talking about, Langdon? The installation of the small lamp inside the machine head is clear and is, I presume, also practical. And now as to that new shutter business: I cannot offer you any advice without knowing exactly what manner of shutter you have invented. I was a little bit amused, Langdon, at your saying you had worked a week at the problem and evolved a better shutter than has been discovered by those who have worked on that particular puzzle for years. By this I don't mean that it isn't possible that you have discovered something of value, but, frankly, Langdon, it is rather improbable, since machine manufacturers have been studying the shutter problem for many years, and it seems as though almost everything on the face of the earth has already been tried out. If you have something of value, you had better patent it. Having done so, you can send me a model and then I will tell you what course you had better pursue in the matter. That film cleaning block sounds all right, but you should be careful with the alcohol end of it, since alcohol has a tendency to cause the film to curl badly. I presume what Langdon means by "spikes on the block" is that he staples four large round spikes tightly to the side of the upper block, two on either side near the ends, and then drives staples in the lower block to receive them so as to hold the two blocks together, the top one being readily lifted away from the lower one. I hardly see the necessity in running the films through a machine to inspect them, though it would, of course, be somewhat quicker. My own way of inspecting films is to unwind them into a tank, one at a time, and then rewind slowly, holding the edge of the film between the thumb and finger so as to detect loose patches, broken sprocket holes, etc. I don't understand exactly what you mean by the film being "sprocketed." I at first thought you meant where the film had climbed the sprocket and the marks of the teeth showed in the body of the film, but I presume you most likely refer to split sprocket holes. Now Langdon, don't get offended at my comments. You must remember that you have to describe things very accurately or else I have got to do a lot of guessing. Your letter is easy compared to some of those I have to dope out. Come again, but be a little more careful in describing things.

Aluminum Screen Defended.

Mr. Dittmann, proprietor Dittmann Theater, Brownsville, Tex., contributes the following:

I have noticed your disapproval of various kinds of the silver or aluminum screens. I will give you my personal experience with one of these screens which I made myself over two years ago, and wish to say it is not turning black. If anything it has improved with age, so that I get a better picture today than when it was new. Two years certainly ought to tell the tale. I don't see why it should tarnish any more than gold or silver lettered signs which are exposed to all kinds of weather. But even if it did deteriorate, it is but little trouble to renew the finish, which makes it as good as new again. While in Chicago, over a year ago, I saw aluminum screens, some on cloth and some on walls, all giving better pictures than any whitewash or plain sheet. I was back there again last month and saw the same screens doing business at the old stands and just as perfectly as ever. One screen made in New York State is across the river here and has been in about a year. It is not turning dark as yet. On page 1279, September 28th issue, under "More Foolish Laws," you state you will give your aid where such laws are about to be inaugurated. As such is the case here I wish you would give us the way you think it ought to be written. I take it you have the whole law as it's given out by the State Fire Board of the State of Texas for cities to copy after. Give your criticisms of the whole please. Why doesn't Missouri, who has a 3 h.p. F.M. engine, also get his generator there. He can also find out, by giving the kind and style of engine he has, whether or not it is one suitable to produce steady electric current. Not all gasoline engines, even of the above make, are good for producing steady current pressure. Gasoline engines for dynamo running must be equipped with a throttling governor and heavier flywheels than ordinary. From all reports the F. M. Co. put out a thoroughly reliable isolated plant for projection purposes. Some others have not demonstrated the efficiency of their plants so well. I suggested to Pathe Freres recently that they place their titles following the Censor Board announcement, instead of as now, the title first. I make this suggestion as the end of a film always wears away, which means the title, as it now is. If the censor announcement were first its wearing away would injure no one and it would protect the title. It is more convenient for the manufacturer or exchange to hook on another censor announcement than to make a new title.

The curtain matter I shall not comment upon, Brother Dittmann, except to say I have never issued a sweeping condemnation of aluminum screens, though I have said that such surfaces were likely to oxidize and that the average man could not make a good aluminum curtain. You see the idea was rapidly gaining ground that all that was necessary was to get a bucket of sizing and two or three pounds of aluminum, slap it on some kind of a surface, and, presto! there was an ideal screen. The making of a really good aluminum curtain is an exceedingly difficult proposition, and I would not advise any operator or manager to tackle the job. If they want to try it—well and good. That is up to them, but they will be very likely to run into trouble. No, I have not a copy of the Texas law. If you will send one in, I shall be glad to comment on the same. We will be glad to have the benefit of your comments at any time, brother Dittmann, though such a mass of matter is received that it is not always possible to publish letters in full. We try to pick out those which we believe to be the most interesting or helpful. If the Underwriters' law referred to is the one evolved by a committee of the National Fire Underwriters, of Boston, and commented on in this Department some time ago, it is a bungling farce, unworthy of serious consideration; your comments on title and censor announcement are pertinent and correct.

Problem.

Fort Worth, Tex., submits the following solution to the problem appearing on page 47, October 5th issue:

> In this problem, 1, offering one ohm, is in series with 2, two ohms, and 3, three ohms, in parallel or multiple. We get the total > resistance as follows: 1 equals one ohm. 2 plus 3 jointly equals product, divided by the sum, equals six-fifths, equals one and one-fifth ohms, and one ohm plus one and one-fifth ohms equals two and one-fifth ohms, the total resistance. Now 2 1-5 = 11-5 and 5-11 x 70 = 350 or 31.81 amperes at the arc.

I will not comment on this problem until all those who have desired to figure on it have done so.

Another Solution.

Cincinnati, Ohio, writes:

> Here is my guess on the resistance problem, page 47, October 5th issue: Allowing 55 volts for the arc, leaves 15 volts for the resistance. The resistance is 1 × (2 × 3 ÷ 2 + 3) = 1, plus 6-5 = 2.2. According to Ohm's law, the amperage is 15 ÷ 2.2 = 7 amperes, which will give a feeble light only. Inasmuch as the 55 volts arc pressure varies, there will consequently be a variation in the voltage available for the resistance; therefore in the amperage passed; but these variations will be inconsiderable.

As I remarked before, I will not comment on these replies until they are all in. However, it seems as though very few of the men have the nerve to tackle this problem, since the replies to date are limited to these two.

New York City takes our breath away with the following:

> I herewith present something new to occupy the operator during the long, long hours which embrace his days' work in this foremost city of our land. Also enterprising managers might profit by this discovery. By the term "enterprising" I mean those managers who compel the operator to repair seats, sweep the theater, trim the arc lamps, get the reels and return them and then grind from 1 to 11 P. M. As to whether the thing will work in every theater is an open question, and now here I am—and don't laugh! While I twist the crank of my Power's Six and watch carefully my well illuminated picture, I am receiving wireless messages from all over the world. The messages are heard in the form of a long and short buzz and are in the Continental Code. These messages come across the arc. Where are they from, or rather how do they get there? I don't know, but I get them just the same. October the second I received the following: "A. M. 'P. H. New York, October 2nd. Ship off. Report later. Exp. Ajax. Soon. Follow ord. Sig. N. Y. S. N. 9—33." I usually get the messages between one and four, or seven to ten P. M. and they come very clear. I neglected to say that I was once a wireless operator. I should be pleased if you would stop here sometime and verify this for yourself. Am using 25 amperes, d.c., 110 volts through a rheostat. Can you explain the phenomenon?

No indeed, neighbor, I cannot undertake the contract of explaining any such thing as that, but I am not going to dispute its possibility, because just a few days ago I was holding to my ear the receiver of one of the telephones in the office of The Moving Picture World, waiting response to a call, and I heard wireless messages very distinctly. There could be no mistake about it. I have listened to wireless messages (to the uninitiated, I will say that wireless messages are received through a telephone receiver which is held over the ear by a spring arrangement passing over the head of the operator) many times, and know the peculiar sound of them, therefore I was not mistaken. Now, just how the messages got on the telephone wire in a way to be reproduced on the receiver, I cannot say; but they were there all right, though of course, I could not read them. If any other operator has noticed the same thing, we should be glad to hear from him. The whole problem is no doubt a matter of electrical frequency or vibration, requiring two instruments, transmitter and receiver, to be in perfect tune or synchronism. The natural laws of Harmonics, or vibratory affinity, enter largely into wireless telegraphy, and your case is probably one of accidental harmonics.

Plant City, Florida, writes:

> Am using Power's "Six" and Hallberg's Economizer; 110 volt, 60 cycle current. Have a plastered wall with white finish for a screen. Picture is a little over 10 feet and a half, with a 68-foot throw. Have been using a 1-16 h.p. motor to run my machine for a little more than three years. At first I was using an Edison projector with the motor connected to the lower sprocket shaft. At the end of two years I put in Power's "Six," which I now have. The bearing on the Edison was hardly worn at all, nor is the bearing on my Power's Six worn at all, as far as I can see. I cannot understand why any operator should wish to belt to his fly-wheel when it is such a simple matter to use the lower sprocket shaft and have everything on the off side of the machine out of the way. As soon as I get in my new operating room I will send a photograph of my machine, so that other operators who are interested can see how easy it is to do it. I am going to have a new operating room soon, and it is to be 10 x 22 with an 8-foot ceiling; windows to open to the outside of the house for ventilation. It is to have a 30-inch ventilator in the top, which will reach at least four feet above the roof. I think that will be large enough, but if you don't think so, I will have it made larger, if you will let me know before ten days from date.

Thirty inches is large enough, Plant City, both for ventilation and for the more important office of carrying away the smoke in case of a film fire. I would suggest that you install a damper in that pipe, weighted so as to stand normally open, and only to be held shut by a cord attached to the master-cord which holds your operating room shutters, so that in case of fire when the master-cord is released the damper in the vent pipe will drop open instantly. This is a very important matter. Without it your operating room cannot properly be said to be fireproof no matter what its walls may be made of, or how efficient its wall shutters may be. In order to have a truly fireproof operating room, absolutely automatic positive provision must be made for the carrying away of all smoke in case of fire. It is not the fire itself which, ordinarily, injures an audience, but the alarm caused by the sight of smoke or flame and I will say again and again that it is a childlishly simple matter to so construct an operating room so that a film fire may occur, half a doen reels of film be burned, and the audience absolutely not know there is a fire in the theater. What you say about motor drives is correct, though an even better scheme is to get the regular motor drive attachment. We shall be glad to have the photograph when it is ready.

Expert (with a small "e") Advice.

Nebraska writes:

> Is it customary to use a hard carbon (¼-inch) above, and a soft carbon (⅝-inch) below on alternating current? Does a transformer change alternating current into direct current at the arc; that is, does it make a "direct current arc?" Would a voltmeter placed where the operator could watch it, make it unnecessary for the operator to watch anything else but this voltmeter in order to get the best results in adjusting the carbons and in getting a good light? My reason for asking such apparently foolish questions is that an electrician and moving picture man of fourteen years' experience, at present traveling as representative for some electrical house, and drawing $120 per month, came to the proprietor the other day with all this advice and information. He also came to the writer with the same information later. The proprietor is rather inclined to think well of this fellow's advice, by weight of the fourteen years' experience and the $120, probably; but the writer is of the opinion that the man is more or less full of prunes. He thinks that if two hard carbons would make the light yellow, one hard carbon would have the same effect though probably not so much. The gentleman makes the assertion, however, that our theater is the only one he was ever in that didn't use one hard and one soft carbon on alternating. The writer has always thought also that alternating current was alternating current at the arc just as well as anywhere else; but the gentleman tells us that the transformer makes alternating current direct at the arc. This kind man also tells us that the voltmeter, in addition to making it unnecessary for the operator to watch the picture in adjusting the light, would make a big saving in the electric bill. Would you be kind enough to tell me wherein it would save?

I very much doubt if this exceedingly efficient expert is drawing $120 per month, at least on account of what he knows about electricity. His statements are of no value whatever. Up to 60 amperes, use two ⅝ cored carbons. From 60 to 80 amperes use two ¾ cored carbons. Never use a solid carbon with alternating current. His statement that a ¼-inch hard carbon is used above with a.c. is positively grotesque. Try it once and watch the results on the screen. As to the transformer changing a.c. to d.c., I am glad to be informed of that fact. I believe this will be news to even Mr. Edison himself. The expert in question is the only man, so far as I know, who has ever discovered these very wonderful things. I presume very likely he was thinking of the Mercury Arc Rectifier, which does change alternating current to direct. A transformer does nothing of the kind. As to the voltmeter, it would have no effect on your current bills at all. A good ammeter placed where the operator can see it all the time might effect a saving, since it would enable him to handle his arc more economically.

News and Views of Houses Here and There.

BIJOU-GRAND—WALLA WALLA, WASH.

MR. A. WESLEY EILER is the proprietor and manager of the Bijou-Grand Theater, a half-tone of which we publish herewith. The building is 40 feet wide, thoroughly fireproof, and is two and a half stories in height.

Bijou-Grand Theater.

The auditorium contains five hundred large, roomy opera chairs, one hundred of which are in the balcony; the boxes are decorated in red and gold and seat five persons each. The house is fitted with beautiful lighting fixtures, and all the wiring is done through conduits. In cold weather the place is heated with a hot water system; in the summer it is kept cool by a good ventilating system and a large number of fans.

Power's No. 6 machine, in a steel operating booth, is used as projector. The throw is fifty feet. The measurements of the stage are twenty feet by forty feet, and there are copious dressing rooms in the basement. Pictures only are exhibited. Mr. A. W. Eiler claims to be the pioneer picture man of Walla Walla.

We reproduce herewith a picture of the Lyric Theater, Independence, Kansas, of which Mr. McBride is the proprietor. As will be seen by the halftone, Mr. McBride has some very good ideas in advertising a feature picture, which counts for much of his success as an exhibitor. He does extensive newspaper advertising, and whenever he gets a good feature picture, he advertises it with an electric sign that stretches across the street outside of his house. Mr. McBride has been enjoying a favorable amount of business since he entered the picture exhibiting line.

HAS BEEN IN ONE LOCATION EIGHT YEARS.

The Casino Theater, in Federal Street, Pittsburgh, Pa., a picture of which is herewith printed, has been in Federal Street on its original location for eight years. That speaks very well for a moving picture house. The lettering on top can be seen for many blocks away when it is lighted in the evening. Both the exterior and interior of the house is very pretty and the indirect lighting system is employed. In the projecting room there are two Power's No. 6 machines which are handled by expert men. Straight moving pictures are shown three nights a week, for an admission of five cents, while the other three nights are devoted to vaudeville.

A $35,000 PICTURE HOUSE AT GLENS FALLS, N. Y.

The Park Theater, in Park Street, Glens Falls, New York, has been doing an excellent business since it opened on December 23rd, 1911. The seating capacity is 800, of which 650 seats are on the main floor and the remainder, 150, in the balcony. Mr. Joseph Miller, the manager of the Park, says that the house is one of the most up-to-date and commodious little playhouses in Northern New York. The theater is owned by the Park Amusement Company, of which Mr. Fred T. Bellen is president; Isaac Ginsberg, vice-president; James W. Bellen, treasurer, and Joseph Miller, secretary and manager. Moving pictures and vaudeville constitute the programme.

REFINED VAUDEVILLE AND PICTURE HOUSE AT DUBOIS, PA.

There are not very many small towns of the size of Dubois, Pa., that can boast of expensive and handsome picture and vaudeville theaters as that town can. We print herewith a halftone of "The Carlton," a vaudeville and picture house at Dubois. Although we were not told the cost of this house, one can easily conjecture that it runs away up into the thousands. It is built of dark red "tapestry" brick with a half-inch of gray mortar joint, raked out between each brick, giving it a very pleasing appearance. The admission prices are five and ten cents for children and adults, respectively.

is located at White River Junction, Vermont. The house was recently opened and Junctionites are taking very kindly to pictures. In addition to pictures there are employed a couble vaudeville act and a local trio, the "Wesley-Says-So Trio," with a two-piece orchestra. Three reels of Licensed pictures are run. Wesley says he is the somewhat largish person under the X, which is an X and not the sign of a "ten spot." The ten spot is in his pocket along with some others. Wesley says so.

HOLDS RECORD FOR CHANGING REELS.

Mr. E. C. Pearce, proprietor and manager of the Amuzu Theater, in West Fourth Street, Winston-Salem, N. C.,

says that his theater holds the record for changing reels. He uses an Edison machine and his operator can change a reel in nineteen seconds. If there is any other picture theater that can do better than this, we should like to hear from them. The Amuzu plays to moving pictures and illustrated songs. The admission price is five cents.

REMODELED THEATER COST $18,000.

Central Amusement Company Now Has a Magnificent Photoplay and Vaudeville House.

As the accompanying halftones of the Columbia Theater, Bristol, Tenn.-Va., will attest, the proprietors, Messrs. McClough and Morse certainly have a very fine moving picture and vaudeville house. It is modern in every detail and has a seating capacity of eight hundred persons. The aisles and exits meet every requirement of the law, there being two four-foot aisles in the orchestra and four exits. The twelve boxes are nicely arranged and are draped in a very artistic manner. Each box will comfortably seat six persons. Two hundred of the eight hundred seats are in the balcony, which has two four-foot aisles and four exits.

Columbia Theater.

The stage has a twenty-six foot opening, is twenty-eight feet deep and forty feet high. It is equipped with the finest of fireproof scenery, painted by the Lee-Lash studios of New York. The electrical apparatus of the stage can hardly be excelled, there being two sets of white borders, two sets of blue, two sets of green and two sets of red. The switchboard is of the improved type, there being eight floor plugs which are capable of handling any production.

There are a number of dressing-rooms, which are large and well ventilated. The women's retiring room has an attendant and is elaborately furnished. Carved plaster designs decorate the interior of the theater. Mural paintings and all sculpture work were done by a French artist.

The auditorium is well lighted, there being four hundred twenty-five watt lamps throughout the interior of the theater and a similar number illuminating the front. The spacious lobby is neatly tiled and the entire front is of plaster work. It is said that the theater can be heated or cooled, as the case may be, within fifteen minutes. The Columbia was opened on the 25th of last May and has been doing a "land-office" business since that date.

FORT DODGE, IOWA, HAS NEW PICTURE HOUSE.

The Majestic Theater, in the Carter Building, on upper Central Avenue, Fort Dodge, Iowa, is the name of the new motion picture theater to be opened by the United Amusement Company. First run Independent pictures are shown and the admission price, except on feature days, is five cents. Power's No. 6 machine is used. The theater seats five hundred. Mr. Russell Forbes is the manager.

Allgair & Armstrong, proprietors of the Star theater, at South River, N. J., are erecting another moving picture theater in their town. It will be an up-to-date house, with a seating capacity of about 1000.

"JUAN AND JUANITA" (Lubin).

Juan and Juanita, a photo story made by Wilbert Melville, a Lubin Director, is very romantic and bristles with the atmosphere of the land of the cactus and palm tree. The types are Mexican, but the story is told in our own country, on the border. Juan and Juanita are a humble but loving couple, but the girl's mother will not agree to a wedding until the boy has a little bank roll. Juan is working on the railroad when an order is issued to discharge all Mexican employees. This blocks the course of true love, but accident comes to his aid. One day Juan still hanging around in hopes of an odd job finds the agent of the road in the depot badly done up and a drill engine is vanishing down the line. In quick order it is realized that some outlaws are pursuing a train which has a big consignment of gold. Juan and the agent give chase on a hand car and reach the point of attack in time to put up a fight, capture the robbers and save the gold. When Juan is brought back with his prisoners he is cheered by the crowd and reinstated with a big reward which wins the careful mother's consent, and Juan is enabled to offer Juanita a comfortable and happy home. This story will appeal to the railroad men of the west.

PICTURES OF ROOSEVELT SHOOTING.

The Gaumont camera-men succeeded in getting some close-up views of John Schrank, the would-be assassin of Colonel Roosevelt. No similar pictures were ever taken before, as it has nearly always happened in the past that men of this class have been shut up in jail immediately upon commission of their crimes and have not been taken into the streets again. In the Schrank case, however, the prisoner was led from the county jail to the courthouse, securely handcuffed to two guards. Camera operators had been stationed along several possible lines of travel between the jail and the courthouse for four days, and one of these operators happened to be on the unfrequented street chosen for the trip. Schrank and the guards walked into the camera practically without knowing it. These were the only motion pictures made of this would-be murderer who is probably as sincerely despised as any creature on earth. This scene will appear in the Gaumont Weekly No. 33.

ONLY AN "AUTO INTERIOR"—BUT

Oh, it all looks very simple in the picture but, as a matter of fact, it wasn't such an easy thing to film. Take the scene supposed to take place inside an automobile in Thanhouser's "Little Girl Next Door," released Friday, Nov. 1. You witness the "action" in the auto and either surmise it's a genuine auto "interior"—or isn't. At any rate, you take what you see for granted, since there are so many films these days, and so many realistic effects in them, that all things seem easy to the picture producer. The particular scene in "The Little Girl Next Door" was photographed inside a very real auto, as the cut shows. A car with a certain special "body" had to be secured from an automobile manufactory, transported to New Rochelle, dissembled so that the photographer could focus his machine properly on the interior, reassembled and then shipped back to the maker. Oh, the finished film as you see it in the theater, to the tune of easy-going music, makes it all appear most simple, but if you say "simple" to the producers of the scene, you'll lose your life!

"MISS SIMKINS' SUMMER BOARDER" (Essanay).

Here is a snappy pastoral comedy from Essanay's Eastern studio that fairly radiates joy and good humor. The plot is vivacious, novel and thoroughly enjoyable.

Joe Mason, a bashful country boy, tries in vain to propose to Marian Foster, his sweetheart. But his bashfulness always gets the best of him, and the proposal is just as far off as ever when Jack Richards, a brisk city chap, comes to board out the summer at the home of Miss Simkins, a spinster. In the course of his wandering around, Richards is introduced to Marian and immediately falls in love with her, much to Joe's discomfiture. Marian does not return Jack's love, but is fascinated by his dashing manner and carries on a mild flirtation just to tantalize Joe. A Sunday School picnic is now planned, and a rather novel scheme is decided upon. The name of each girl and boy is placed inside the lunch boxes, and, these boxes are to be drawn and the couples paired off according to the names. Richards is right in his glory and, discovering the lunch box in which Marian has placed her name, publicly announces that he will marry the girl he lunches with. Marian's sister, Florence, overhears him, substitutes Miss Simkins' name for Marian's and, arriving at the picnic grounds, auctions off the lunch boxes. Richards eagerly outbids Joe, gets the lunch box, hunts out Marian, opens the box triumphantly and is badly stung to find the name of Miss Simkins inside. Florence takes care to let the spinster know, and the boarding house lady immediately starts off in pursuit of the discomfited city chap while Joe, with Marian clasped in his arms, roars with laughter at the funny sight.

John Steppling is right in his element as the brisk young Richards from the city, and makes things lively enough until he is so cruelly squelched. Eleanor Blanchard portrays the prim Miss Simkins in a way that leaves nothing to be desired, Mildred Weston and Evebelle Prout are charming as the Foster sisters and Whitney Raymond is well cast as the bashful country lover. The production is enhanced with many charming pastoral scenes of natural beauty, and the atmosphere throughout is splendid in rustic simplicity.

The film is booked for release Tuesday, Oct. 29th.

FOR THE GAUMONT WEEKLY.

On Saturday, October 19th, the Gaumont Weekly dispatched one of its operators, J. Roy Hunt, on a trip around the world. He sailed on the Hamburg-American liner Cleveland and will spend about three months in China and Japan, returning by way of the Hawaiian Islands and San Francisco. The product of his camera will be seen on future numbers of the Weekly and on the Gaumont popular new release, the Saturday "Great Events" film.

Another Gaumont cameraman will leave Galveston, November 9th, with the Galveston Chamber of Commerce on a trip through Central America, occupying five or six weeks. He will visit practically all the countries north of Panama and south of Mexico. This trip will be made by the United Fruit Company's new line which has recently been established between Galveston and Central American points.

THANHOUSER'S "STAR OF BETHLEHEM."

What is described as an impressive biblical subject is soon to be released on the state right plan by the Thanhouser Company under the title of "The Star of Bethlehem," a multiple reel subject. The Thanhouser Company has spared no expense to give this subject a proper setting and has assembled a notable cast of players and suitable costumes for the production. The story harks back to the Prophet Micah, who was one of the first to focus the hope of Israel upon a great Redeemer. His prediction set forth in the Bible, is believed to date from Sennacherib's campaign against Judah in 701 B. C. The prophet sees the possibility of Zion's capitulation, but declared that the people should find deliverance elsewhere. Bethlehem was the birthplace of David and from that place Micah declared the Deliverer and King should emerge.

The Thanhouser pictures the events leading up to the birth of Christ and the discovery of the child in the manger by the three wise men and the shepherds. An extended review of this subject will appear in these columns later.

NEW PICTURE HOUSE BUILDING.

George Henry Dieringer, an architect and superintendent of construction, with offices at Wheeling, W. Va., is building in that city a modern high class motion picture theater. It will be properly equipped throughout, including stage, balcony, etc., and will be used as a vaudeville and motion picture house. The entire building will be of fireproof material. The projection room will be equipped with two machines complete, one spot and a special machine for mechanical effects. The structure will have a seating capacity of exactly 1,200 and will be under the direct management of Mr. Dieringer. Without equipment the building will cost around $25,000. The outside dimensions are fifty-five feet front and one hundred feet long.

Some of the theaters to Mr. Dieringer's credit are the Roma theater erected at Bellaire, Ohio. This house was built by the Bellaire Amusement Company and cost $23,000. It is fireproof throughout and seats 500. Three thousand dollars alone has been expended for tapestry and freehand decorative work, which places this picture house in a class by itself for luxurious appointments. The Rex motion picture theater erected at Martins Ferry, Ohio, was another house built under Mr. Dieringer's supervision and design. This house was built by the Athenian Amusement Company of Wheeling, W. Va., and is meeting with success. It has a seating capacity of eight hundred. There are many other picture houses designed by Mr. Dieringer, too numerous to mention.

"THE TRANSGRESSION OF DEACON JONES" (Eclair).

The writer has always had a great appreciation and liking for the work of Alec B. Francis, who assumes the title role in "The Transgression of Deacon Jones." He is an actor of a dominant personality, yet has that sufficient mastery of his profession that he does not allow it to exceed his characterizations. It is rather a blend and so when properly cast his performance is a delight to see. Miss Tennant as usual makes the most of a light role and Geo. Larkin, as the owner of the picture theater, gives his customary O. K. performance.

Especial praise must be accorded a bit of double exposing wherein is shown a moving picture screen projection. The register of action is absolutely perfect, under very difficult conditions. The county fair atmosphere is refreshing and novel.

Scene from "The Transgression of Deacon Jones" (Eclair).

The story deals particularly with the little duplicities which deacons are fictitiously supposed to be heir to. Deacon Jones is running for Mayor on a Purity League ticket which has for its particular platform the abolition of moving picture theaters. Miss Tennant, his daughter, is in love with Larkin, who owns the town's leading nicklelodeon. But Deacon Jones has put his foot down on their union as long as Larkin sticks to the theater. Well the Deacon visits the county fair and a capper for the three shell game persuades him how easily it is to pick out the elusive little pea. So the Deacon bets his head off. During all this action an Eclair camera man has been grinding off some topical views of the fair.

Larkin several days later receives the film in his program and at a private showing sees his future father-in-law enact his moral lapse in trying to get rich quick. So he uses this evidence of the Deacon's transgression as a whip to force his consent. It is "either consent to our marriage or I show the picture to the whole town."

Larkin wins his consent and the film is never shown..

MOVING PICTURES STOLEN.

The Washington Film Exchange of Washington, District of Columbia, report that on September 25th, S. A. Watt, of Farmville, N. C., ordered four commercial reels, which consignment went forward C O. D. and was lifted but not returned. We understand that Mr. C. O. Moss, of Petersburg, Va., received an order from the same party for eight commercial reels which, like the above, have not been returned. The reels belonging to the parties mentioned are as follows:

Washington Film Exchange.—I Wish I had a Girl (Imp.); Taming Mrs. Shrew (Rex); Rollicking Red Big Lark (Nestor); Flying to Fortune (Thanhauser).

Mr. C. O. Moss.—His Brother Willie (Powers); Indian's Bride (Pathe); Fatty of E Z Ranch (Nestor); The Convert (Imp.); Three Million Dollars (Amer.); Uncle's Visit to Washington (Reliance); The Voyager (Selig); Unexpected Santa Claus (Solax).

Any information which will lead to the return of these reels and the conviction of the party withholding same will be greatly appreciated by the Washington Film Exchange.

GENTER TO ENLARGE PLANT.

We understand the J. H. Genter Co., manufacturers of the "Mirroroide" screen, have just received official notice that all their patents will be allowed. They are awaiting receipt of final papers before enlarging their plant considerably to take care of their rapidly increasing business.

"SUE" (Champion).

There is a fine situation in this picture, "Sue," filmed from Hal Reid's melodrama of the same name. It is a story of Kentucky love and of a noble hearted woman who gave her life to save her rival. There is a shudder-making rattlesnake scene with tense dramatic action. Sue dies, not directly from its bite; but gets the poison through a bruised lip. She had fallen and knew that the cut would cause her death when she sucked the arm of her already unconscious rival who had been stung; yet, after a dramatic struggle, she does just that.

Scene from "Sue" (Champion).

The man she loves is a widower. She has been foster mother to his little girl, a part that is taken by a charming little player. The other girl is an authoress, in the mountains to find local color. Sue sees that the man's affections have turned from her to the newcomer and she is resentful. This is heightened by the fear that in case the man marries the authoress, she will also lose the little girl who is as a daughter to her. When she finds the interloper stung, a wave of joy passes over her. "Let her die," she cries. But quickly she realizes what the loss will mean to the man she loves and, returning, draws out the venom with her bruised lip and dies. A picture that will entertain and please. It will be released on October 28.

"BROKEN HEARTS" (Pathe).

Jim Brooks, the owner of a promising copper mine, is overjoyed one day upon receiving a letter offering to purchase the mine for $100,000. With the letter in his pocket he hurries home, but on the threshold, born of his delight, an idea strikes him and he decides to keep silent for the time being and later surprise his wife with the glad tidings. His wife discovers him reading the purchaser's letter and asks to see it. Jim refuses and Mrs. Brooks grows suspicious. When Jim fails to return home that evening the woman is heartbroken. She turns her back upon her old home, leaving a note of rebuke to her husband. She is followed by an Indian man servant who is just in time to foil her attempted suicide, dragging her from a railroad track just as the G. L. H. express thunders past.

Jim returns in the meantime loaded down with all sorts of expensive finery with which to delight his good wife. He soon discovers the note. As he reads it his high-borne hopes are dashed to the ground. After an exceptionally fine piece of emotional acting Jim Brooks leaves the house and wanders aimlessly about the woods. The Indian persuades the unhappy woman to return to her home. Her tears are quickly changed to smiles as she sees the array of pretty clothes, and the meaning of Jim's secrecy is disclosed. The Indian slips out and returns with the distracted Jim. A word of explanation from each straightens out the tangle and a fond embrace leads the way to a happier and more prosperous future.

The acting and the photography in this film are of the best and as it has an appeal to every human emotion it is sure to score success. It will be released November 6th.

A committee has been appointed to look after state and municipal topics, and John T. Fitzsimmons was appointed attorney for the local.

SNAPPED ON SELIG'S WILD ANIMAL FARM, "BABY" LILLIAN WADE AND MISS BETTY HARTE PLAYING WITH LION CUBS.

"Baby" Lillian is the exceedingly popular and talented child actress that plays the most important part in the latest and greatest of the Selig wild animal subjects. "Baby" Lillian is well known to all picture audiences through her remarkable talents as portrayed in former Selig and Biograph pictures. Her work in "Kings of the Forest" is said to be the best she has yet done.

The authorities of Pretoria (Transvaal) have decided to take measures of promoting emigration to South Africa by subsidizing and favoring in every possible way such film companies as print scenes of the Transvaal and Transvaal life calculated to bring emigrants.

"A DREAMLAND TRAGEDY" (Powers).

"A Dreamland Tragedy" is a story of everyday life; but it is dreamed and happily turns out to be not real. A few real-life scenes introduce it and the same setting appears in the dream scenes. One of the remarkable things about it is the natural way in which the two hook together. We who watch get the same impressions as though we dreamed; we are not sure that it isn't real. The relief at the end is, therefore, very pleasing. The impression also is novel, something that spectators are not accustomed to and will be pleased with.

The sets are mostly interiors with just enough other scenes to carry the story, and they show a workingman's home. It is the workingman's daughter (Miss Barker), who dreams and the players of her dream are her father, her brother and her lover, the paymaster, whom she knows has with him a large sum of his employer's money and whom she nervously fears is careless with it. This part is played by Gale White.

The form the girl's dream takes is a tragedy. She sees her father "doping" the paymaster's drink, sees him bring the limp, unconscious man to the home and search him for the money. At the end, the three men come home to supper find her sleeping and waken her.

It is a picture that strangely convinces. Dreams are naturally somewhat loose in construction; but the illusion always holds us even when in our dreams we say to ourselves that we are only dreaming. The story holds in that same way. It is for release November 1st.

In Valencia, Spain, the military authorities had films made of great cavalry maneuvers held in the vicinity. It is said that the Spanish government intends to exhibit these films in every barracks in the kingdom in order to prepare the recruits for the greatest possible efficiency.

FRENZIED FINANCE

PATHE 3 REELS

Claude Rodgers, a reckless gambler, falls heir to a banking business through the will of his father-in-law. The bank, when he receives it, is staple and secure, but Rodgers immediately launches a "Get-rich-quick" scheme and starts a campaign to get depositors by promises of fabulous interest. The bank soon becomes the largest, although not the safest, in the East. But good things cannot last forever, and with his wife's sickness Rodgers' luck turns. A run on the bank is the next misfortune, and because of Rodgers' extravagance it cannot stand the strain. Amidst a scene of wild disorder at the Stock Exchange, the bank's stock collapses. A mob of ruined depositors storms the home of the banker, pursuing him through the rooms until they find that a bullet from his revolver has brought his reckless career to a close.

The Lion Tamer's Revenge

Cines-Kleine Two Reels

A sensational story in which lions play an important part and cause many a thrill. Love, jealousy and revenge are, of course, the principal ingredients in this splendid drama, the closing scene being wonderful. A jealous lover, with the assistance of a clown—the play being enacted in a circus—lures his rival and his partner, the girl, into the den of lions, and binds them to a post. The woman manages to escape, later to accuse the murderer, but the lover is mangled to death by the infuriated lions.

The Count of Monte Cristo

Selig Release October 14, 1912. Three Reels

The wonderful and tragic story of Edmond Dantes, a young Frenchman, who is entrusted with a message to the exiled Napoleon on the Isle of Elba, forms one of the greatest themes ever written upon. The full reproduction of this masterpiece by Selig is unequalled by any stage production. There are over 300 people in the cast and shows the wonderful scene, gorgeous costumes and elaborate stage setting. This is one of the most fascinating pictures ever produced.

Shakespeare's As You Like It

Vitagraph Release October 7, 1912. Three Reels.

Presented by the Vitagraph Company, with ROSE COGHLAN as Rosalind.

The Man Hunt

Pathe Release September 30, 1912. Two Reels.

Kilborne, a poacher, is loved by Rose, the daughter of an old charwoman, whose cabin in the midst of a dense forest is Kilborne's rendezvous. Although Rose has often saved Kilborne from the hand of the law, brutal treatment is her only reward, for Kilborne is in love with a farmer's daughter. He is being tracked by the gendarmes, and Rose, suspecting that he is at the farmer's house, hurries there to warn him of the impending danger. The police arrive at the farm immediately after her and surround the house. When Kilborne steps through the door he is ordered to surrender. He refuses. An officer raises his gun and fires. Rose steps in front of Kilborne as the shot rings out and receives the bullet in her heart. As she breathes her last Kilborne weeps for the first time in his life and realizes the depth of the love he never recognized.

Daughter of the Spy

Cines-Kleine Release September 16, 1912. Two Reels

This is a story of a spy who gives shelter in his own home to a nobleman fleeing from the soldiers. The nobleman informs his host, and his beautiful daughter of his identity and shortly after a file of soldiers enters the house and places him under arrest. Before going to prison, he denounces father and daughter for their duplicity. Heart-broken, at the fate of the nobleman, the daughter determines to make a desperate effort to release him. On a pretext she enters the prison and is shown about, noting carefully the location of the prisoner's cell. By a ruse, she procures the keys to the cell directly above that of the nobleman and with a crow-bar breaks a hole in the flooring, lowers a rope and helps the prisoner to liberty. The two make a perilous descent down the castle wall to the casement below. Meanwhile, the girl's father, the spy, is on the wall with the sentry, and discerning the figures of the fugitives, seizes a rifle and fires. To his horror he finds he has taken the life of his own daughter.

The Blighted Son

Pathe Release September 9, 1912. Four Reels.

This is a story of a young man whose father is very wealthy. He leads a life of reckless dissipation until the father, learning the use his son is making of the money, refuses to furnish further funds. The young fellow thereupon commits his first crime; the crime of theft. The shock of this disgrace brings an attack of apoplexy upon the father, which makes him totally blind. From this time it is a rapid drop to bankruptcy for the once honored family. When it is too late the young man realizes his error and determines to begin life anew. He leaves his native country for South Africa and, after fearful hardships, which develop the better side of his character, he returns to his native land—a man.

Fire at Sea

Pathe Release August 26, 1912. Two Reels.

An old sea captain, a slave to liquor, is hired to sail the schooner "Joanna" with a cargo of gunpowder for a revolutionary project. A young man sails with him, against the advice of his sweetheart, who has a premonition of evil. When a few days out to sea, and while the young sailor is asleep, the skipper drinks until he is irresponsible. He goes into the powder room smoking his pipe. Soon he falls asleep and the pipe, dropping from his hand, ignites the powder. A deafening roar and the vessel is a mass of flames, leaving a wreck-strewn sea and a red glow in the sky to tell a waiting sweetheart the story of her lover's fate.

Rip Van Winkle

Vitagraph Release August 19, 1912. Two Reels.

This legend is written by Washington Irving, of the time of George III of England, during the occupation of this country by the English in the 18th century. The story of Rip Van Winkle, the happy-go-lucky, ne'er-do-well, is well known to every child. Rip Van Winkle is portrayed by that eminent actor, Mr. Robert McWade, Sr., who was associated for so long with the famous Joe Jefferson. The splendid Vitagraph Company carry out the other parts in their usual creditable way.

Rameses, King of Egypt

Cines-Kleine Release August 12, 1912. Two Reels.

A production of unparalleled magnificence, depicting a thrilling romance, laid in the days of ancient Egypt.

King Rameses, hearing of the beauty of a young shepherdess, disguises himself as a peasant and journeys to her home. She resents his ardent advances and tells him of her devoted lover, a shepherd, tending his flocks on the mountain slopes.

The King, angered, has her carried off by force to his palace. Although rejected, he determines to win her with lavishness, but without avail.

The shepherd, hearing of his lover's abduction, vows vengeance on King Rameses and attempts to stab him.

When again the king's advances to the shepherdess are rejected, he orders the two lovers before him and, in all the magnificence of the Egyptian court, he magnanimously commands their marriage to take place.

The splendor of the Oriental Courts, wonderful processions and ceremonies are all shown in a story not soon forgotten.

Don Juan and Charles V

Pathe Release July 29, 1912. Two Reels.

Charles V, abdicated the Spanish throne in favor of his son, who became Philip II. Almost the first thing Philip did was to fall in love with Lucinda, a beautiful Spanish maid, who was practically betrothed to Don Juan, a young student. Don Juan insults the new king when he finds him forcing his attentions upon Lucinda. Don is arrested and Lucinda brought to the torture chamber to see him suffer in the hope that in order to save him she will consent to marry the King. Charles V is informed of the situation and, coming out of the monastery to which he has retired, he astounds the younger men by acquainting them with the fact that they are brothers. He makes them pledge their loyalty to one another, asks Lucinda to choose between the two men and when she and Don Juan embrace, gives them his blessing.

Siege of Petersburg

Kalem Release July 22, 1912. Two Reels.

A visit of a Confederate officer to his betrothed and her family is interrupted by a young man and his crippled sister who have been made paupers by the ravages of the war. The young pauper proclaims his love for the young lady of the house, and in order to demonstrate his bravery and loyalty, enlists in the Confederate cause. Some months later the young soldier rescues his rival, the Confederate officer, from a burning bridge. A year elapses, and the pauper has been promoted to a lieutenancy. The Confederates are entrenched before Petersburg, and the Federals succeed in mining a part of the Confederates' outer works, but their batteries are discovered in time to frustrate their plans. The Confederates place a small detachment under command of the poor, young lieutenant, to keep the nearby batteries working. The officer whose life has been saved, realizes the danger to the young lieutenant, forges an order, relieving him of that hazardous duty and takes command himself The mine is exploded and the gallant officer and his men are killed.

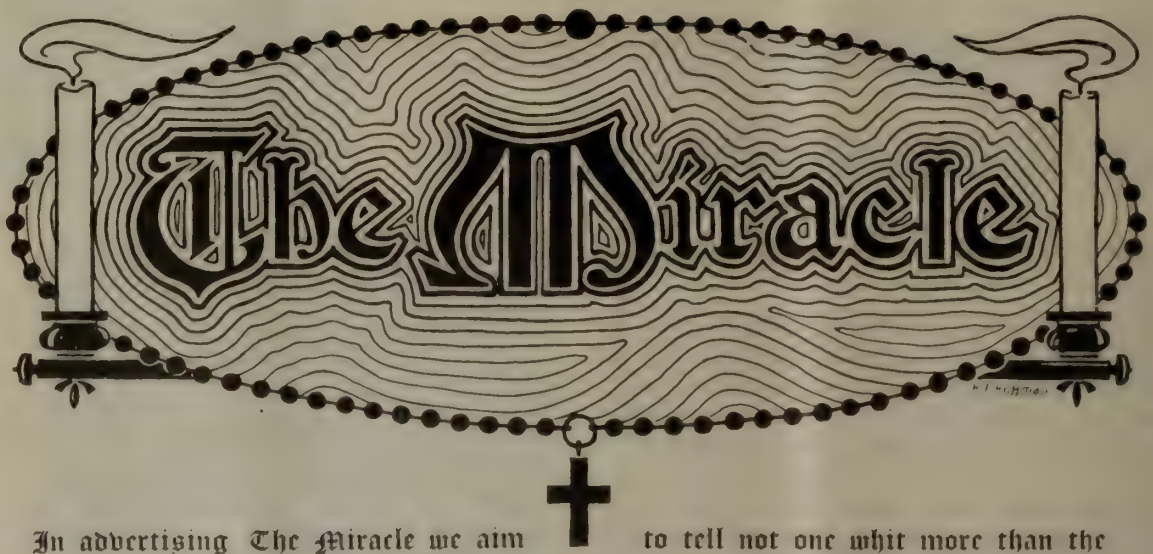
Every Dollar Spent in Advertising an Inferior Article is Worse than Wasted



In advertising The Miracle we aim to tell not one whit more than the plain truth. We ask you to consider these facts:

I.—The Miracle is a superb spectacular production in four reels (4200 feet).

II.—One year has been spent in its preparation.

III. A grand and impressive musical score, composed by a musician of note, goes with the picture and helps to make it a unique exhibition.

IV.—No part of this picture has been taken in studios. The interiors and exteriors of the churches, castles and monasteries have been specially selected, and make a marvelous and unrivaled frame for the story.

V.—The Miracle is easily understood and needs no lecture. It possesses all the art of the best features ever made, but its appeal is made to all mankind at all times. It is in season at Easter and at Christmas and on every day of the year. It will be welcome to any and every audience anywhere in the world.

VI.—It is a high-class production and will be sold accordingly.

VII.—Fine paper in all sizes, designed by masterly hands, will go with the reels.

VIII.—We will furnish all advertising and a most complete set of literature, pamphlets, heralds, photos, etc., etc.

IX.—We have done everything possible under the law to prevent the possibility of infringement.

The Miracle will be the Greatest Money Getter Ever Produced

To every buyer of State Rights from any part of the United States and Canada we will allow full fare and expenses of trip in case of purchase

LOVE VS. GRATITUDE (Nov. 5).—Grace is an actress of great beauty and charming personality. George is her most devoted admirer. She likes George as a comrade, but cannot make up her mind to regard him in any other way.

One day Grace receives a visit from a dear friend Irene Ferri, who asks her assistance, explaining that her father is unable to meet a note and is threatened with bankruptcy.

Grace is sympathetic, but helpless. Suddenly a happy thought occurs to her; she will send for George and ask his opinion. Without hesitation the generous-hearted fellow agrees to take up the note and thus save Irene's parents from disgrace. Needless to say, he is overwhelmed with expressions of gratitude from the two girls.

Soon afterwards, taking courage again, he declares his love for Grace, and she, remembering his generosity, accepts him. Seeing her motive, he, in turn refuses, saying that he loves her too well to accept gratitude in place of affection.

They part in silence. But several weeks later George receives a note from Grace requesting him to call. When he asks what she has to say to him, she says nothing, but a reply is not necessary; he can read the answer in her eyes.

THE GOLDEN SHELL OF PALERMO (Sicily), (Nov. 5).—We are taken on a delightful trip along the poetical Palermo shores, during which we are able to view many of the most beautiful sights of the island, culminating with a glorious sunset scene in the "Golden Shell" on a summer evening.

NO FOOL LIKE AN OLD FOOL (Nov. 9).—Skinem, a rich old money lender, insists upon the immediate payment of a note which his proud, but poor neighbor, Lang, is unable to meet. Skinem then proposes to cancel the deft if Lang will give to him in marriage his pretty daughter, Marie.

The father indignantly refuses the proposal, but Marie happens to overhear the conversation, and sees a way out of their difficulties. She mischievously tells the old man that if her father doesn't wish the marriage she does, and consents to be his bride.

Now, Marie is secretly engaged to Paul, the nephew of the old miser, and easily enlists his assistance in a plot against his uncle. Paul gathers together a number of the villagers, and tells them of the plan of action. When the hated Skinem takes the girl to his cottage and then goes to look for the squire to "tie the knot," his fellow townsmen pelt him with potatoes.

To cap the climax of his discomfiture, he returns home to find that his nephew has married Marie. At this the old man goes into a terrible rage, but as he had previously cancelled the debt, and arranged a marriage settlement, he is helpless. Seeing nothing else to do, he soon joins the happy throng in making merry at the wedding.

THE LION TAMER'S REVENGE (Oct. 21).—An extended review of this film, by James S. McQuade, was published in our issue dated October 19, 1912.

ECLIPSE.

THE QUEEN OF SPADES (Nov. 6).—Frank Pryor, an ambitious young reporter is assigned to investigate a mysterious suicide club called the "Friends of Plato." He "gets busy" immediately and persuades his friend Mr. Davis to introduce him to the club.

The president of the organization places before him a set of rules which declare that each member shall agree to put an end to his life when it shall be so decided by lot. Pryor willingly affixes his signature to an application for membership.

It happens that a meeting is just about to be held to decide who is to be the "fortunate one." Pryor and the others group themselves around a table while the president proceeds slowly to deal out a deck of cards to the members, who, with bated breath, hesitate to examine them for fear they shall draw the fatal Queen of Spades. Round and round go the cards until finally Frank draws the fatal card. The others, after congratulating him, quietly file out of the room, leaving him a pistol to do the deed. The affair now appears very serious but he cannot escape. His consternation is increased by the appearance of four masked figures who peer in at him through the barred windows.

When he has about given up all hope, Mr. Davis and several friends come and rescue him from his terrible plight.

MELIES.

VALUE RECEIVED (Nov. 14).—Sheriff Johnson "grub stakes" Whitridge in a gold prospecting proposition and puts up the money necessary, with the understanding that should the expedition be success the profits would be divided equally. Soon after Whitridge's departure the sheriff is shot and mortally wounded in rounding up a gang of desperate bandits. His dying act is to turn over the grub-stake agreement to his little son, Jack, that he might derive the profits. Jack is adopted by the doctor, but soon runs away and becomes a cowboy. Whitridge makes a rich strike, but hearing of the sheriff's death decides to ignore the grub-stake.

Fifteen years later finds Jack foreman of a ranch. Whitridge, having made a sufficient fortune, has just purchased the ranch west of that on which Jack is employed and settles down with his wife and daughter Ethel, a girl of seventeen. She soon meets Jack in a romantic way, for he proves himself a hero when his horse runs away. Ethel introduces Jack to her father, who, though he does not recognize Jack, is not favorable to the match. But lovers are not to be outdone and their meetings continue in clandestine. Soon after, Jack goes over his dead father's papers, and discovers the agreement with Whitridge, which he decides to present to the father to further his suit. While Jack is employed, however, Whitridge accidently comes across his coat, finds the agreement, and learns Jack's identity. Taking a further dislike he tears the papers up. In doing this he is perceived by Ethel, who gathers the small pieces, realizes the truth, and hurries to give them to Jack. Together they go to Whitridge and ask permission to marry only to be sternly refused. Then they confront him with the agreement. Whitridge is nonplussed, but Jack, perceiving his discomforture, lights a match and smilingly offers to burn the agreement up in return for his daughter and his blessing. Whitridge agrees and all are happy.

JUAN AND JUANITA (Nov. 4).—Juanita moves to Saltillo, and Juan follows her to find work and make a home for her. Work is scarce, and Juanita's mother has no use for a penniless peon. Luckily, Juan strikes a job. Tony, Tom Darby's fireman on the drill engine, has just been discharged for knifing Darby, and Juan is hired to take his place. The new job makes a new man of the peon. It also brings him into favor with Juanita's mother, who allows Juan to take Juanita for a walk. They pass a consignment of gold en route from the mine to the express office. Juan returns to work, but not for long. The Division Master has stolen the gold consignment, held up the station-on the road, and the order includes Juan. So he is out of a job, and when Juanita's mother hears the news, he is out of a sweetheart also.

He goes to the depot next morning, hoping to find the order cancelled. Instead, he finds the station agent lying on the platform badly wounded, and the drill engine vanishing in the distance. Tony has stolen the gold consignment, held by the station-agent, and compelled Tom Darby to run the engine off with the loot. Juan helps the agent to his feet, and they pursue the locomotive on a hand-car. Tony has stopped at a road crossing, and has bribed a muleteer to help him escape with the gold. His accomplice is in the cab, with a revolver at the engineer's head. Juan boards the engine and overpowers Tom's assailant. With the station agent's help, he binds and gags him, and then captures Tony. By the Time they are back in Saltillo, the news reaches the townspeople, who give them a noisy-reception. Even Tony is forgotten when Darby and the agent tell of Juan's good work. "And the boss fired him!" Not for long, however, A message clicks in on the wire. "Reinstate fireman on double pay. We join with mining company in forwarding deed for homestead as reward." Juan forgets the crowd on hearing the good news, and he hurries to tell Juanita. There is a wedding that night on the hill above Saltillo.

THE SUBSTITUTE HEIRESS (Nov. 5).—James Stillman, a young Western millionaire, calls upon his New York broker, Arnold Winchester, who invites him to his country home. Winchester, however, receives a telegram which prevents him from going, but he sends Stillman and also sends a telegram to his daughter Emily, to entertain him. Emily receives the telegram just as she is about to leave on an automobile trip with her fiance, William Chase, and a couple of friends. They are all greatly disappointed until Chase suggests dressing Emily's maid Ruth in Emily's clothes and letting her play hostess during Emily's absence. The plan is adopted and Ruth is left to entertain Stillman.

Stillman arrives and Ruth acts as hostess. They are greatly impressed with each other and before Stillman leaves they fall in love. Ruth is left very unhappy because she believes her love for Stillman is hopeless in view of her station, and Stillman is brought to earth with a thud soon after when he receives an invitation to Emily Winchester's wedding. He goes to the church and is astonished to find a strange young lady being married as Emily Winchester. He follows the bridal party out of the church. Emily's father sees him and, noticing that there is no recognition between him and Emily, asks her if she does not remember Mr. Stillman, whom she entertained at the country home. Emily comprehends and confesses the deception. Stillman learns that the girl he wants is at the country home and goes there immediately. He finds Ruth and explains the situation to her. Ruth's dreams come true and they are married.

THE SHERIFF'S MISTAKE (Nov. 7).—Nellie, the daughter of Thos. Bassett, a ranchman, is sent to the village postoffice to get the mail. On her way she crosses a creek and comes face to face with a handsome stranger who has just finished watering his horse. He asks her to direct him to Village View. After receiving the desired information he thanks her and rides away. Nellie proceeds to the postoffice and learns that the stage coach has been held up by a bandit. The description tallies with that of the stranger. She gives the matter no further thought until arriving at home with a letter for her father, which tells him that foreclosure proceedings are about to be instituted against the property for the sum of $850. Quickly her thoughts revert to the stranger. If a reward is offered she might be able to capture him, receive the reward, and the mortgage could be paid. She tells her father of her plan, and both ride to the village in time to see the sheriff and posse start in search of the bandit, and to see the reward of $1,000 posted. She persuades her father to go with her and together they begin a search of the valley. They follow the trail taken by the supposed outlaw and finally come upon him, as the sheriff's posse is passing on a nearby trail. Two shots fired by Nellie bring them to the scene and the supposed outlaw is locked up in the village jail. The stranger's protests of innocence struck the breast of Nellie. She determined to sacrifice the reward and help the stranger escape; she rides back to the jail. He tells her of his lost credentials, a letter that will clear him in the eyes of all. She goes over the trail again in search of the missing document and finds it. She also finds the cave of the much wanted bandit. The letter proves to the sheriff that the stranger is a U. S. Secret Service Agent. Nellie leads them all to the cave of the bandit. He is captured and placed in the hands of the posse. Nellie is assured of the reward and the stranger puts his handcuffs on the pretty ranchman's daughter and makes her a prisoner for life.

FELIX AT THE BALL (Nov. 8).—Felix is a "stay-at-home" man, but his wife is a social cyclone. Felix and his wife are invited to a ball in the town hall. The husband doesn't want to go, but his wife insists. His excuse that he hasn't any dress suit is scorned by Mrs. Felix, who goes to a second-hand merchant and hires one for him. She doesn't care about the size and fit. The suit proves several sizes too small for Felix, but his wife insists that it will have to do and she hauls him off to the ball.

Poor Felix is in misery. His coat tails are not long enough to cover the rip in his pants; so, much embarrassed, he backs out of the ball room, and succeed in finding his wife in the hallway. When she learns of the accident she sends Felix into an ante-room and secures a needle and thread from the janitress. Felix removes his trousers and dons a rug, and his wife is mending the rip when the door opens and a couple of young ladies enter the room. Poor Felix immediately goes up in the air and prances about, trying to hide. There is a small door at the other end of the room. Toward this door Felix is pulled by his wife. She opens the door and shoves Felix through. WOW! He's in the ballroom! Frantically he turns back, but finds the door locked. Felix goes wild and prances about the ballroom. Ladies faint and men cuss, but Felix fights his way to a window out of which he jumps and runs through the town. After eluding pursuers,

NOVELTY THEATRE

Louisville, Ky., Oct. 9th, 1912.

The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co.
Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sirs: One year ago today, I made a statement that I could run the MOTIOGRAPH machine in the Novelty Theatre a year, without any repairs, which I think is a good record.

This I did, and they were run on an average of 12 hours every day in the year. Yours very truly,

ERNEST CARPENTER.

AN ACCIDENTAL MILLIONAIRE (Nov. 8).—Michael Duggan, an ordinary laborer, receives word from a firm of lawyers that an uncle in South Africa has died without any near relatives, and that he has inherited his entire estate valued at a million. His wife and daughters immediately want to enter society, but Duggan doesn't care for style. The newspapers hear of Duggan's fortune and interview Mrs. Duggan and daughters. When it appears in the papers a real estate man immediately offers them a furnished mansion one month rent free, while they are besieged with invitations and offers of credit. They take the new house and Mrs. Duggan tries to teach Duggan manners much to his disgust. They go to a swell reception. Duggan introduces his daughters to the supposed noblemen, and the daughters invite them to dinner. The guests, fearing they may not behave just so, decide to watch Duggan and imitate him. Mrs. Duggan tells Duggan to watch the Lord and Duke and imitate them. At the dinner there is a general mix-up, at the end of which the butler brings in a note saying that the fortune will have to go to Mr. Daniel Duggan's son, who was supposed to have been drowned at sea, but who has returned. The creditors make a fuss without avail. Wife and daughter are overcome with grief. Duggan is happy to get away from it all, and back to his overalls and corned beef and cabbage.

THE WATER RATS (Nov. 9).—Bill Graw is the leader of the Water Rats, a gang of thieves infesting the water front. He is kicked out by the gang when he is ill. He attempts to steal a locket from Elsie, daughter of Dane, a tug boat captain. He is caught, but befriended by Elsie. Bill, restored to health and the chiefship of his gang, saves Elsie from the thugs.

Tom Williams, Elsie's sweetheart, is a young police officer. He determines to break up the Water Rats gang. He opens fire, but his fire is returned, and the thieves are about to escape when assistance, brought by Elsie, arrives. The Water Rats seize a motorboat and flee. The police give chase in Dane's tug, with Elsie at the wheel.

Bill jumps from the motorboat and swims ashore. Williams follows him, the tug continuing the pursuit of the motorboat. On shore Bill and Williams grapple. Bill is victorious, and is choking Williams to death when the locket which Bill attempted to steal, and which Elsie gave Williams, identifies the officer as Elsie's sweetheart. Bill sees that escape is impossible. He shows his gratitude to Elsie by doing Williams a good turn, and clasps handcuffs on his own wrists. Meanwhile the tug has overtaken and captured the motorboat, and now returns for Williams. Williams, still unconscious when found, is supposed to have handcuffed his man before giving out. Williams is promoted and receives a handsome reward. Captain Dane gets over an original dislike for Williams and the love affair ends happily.

VITAGRAPH.

AN OFFICIAL APPOINTMENT (Nov. 4).—Colonel Armistead, accompanied by his faithful servant Amber, travels to Washington, where the colonel has made application for an appointment in the State Department. Arriving in Washington, the colonel sets out for the State Department office. He finds little encouragement there. Time goes on until, with no money to pay rent or for food, the old man is threatened with starvation. His faithful old servant Amber, takes his fiddle to a street corner and plays, thereby collecting enough to pay the landlady. In the meantime, the clerks fake up an official appointment, and send it to the colonel. The colonel is overjoyed and on the way to the office he stops a runaway horse, ignorant of the fact that the frightened young lady in the vehicle is the daughter of the Secretary of State. She thanks him kindly and drives off. He goes on to the office and there learns of the joke played upon him.

Soon after, the secretary's daughter calls at her father's office to tell him of her deliverance from certain death. There she discovers the bunch of violets which her father had that morning purchased for her, and which she had in turn, given the old gentleman who had stopped her horse. He had dropped them in the office on learning of the hoax. She coaxes her father to write her deliverer another and legitimate appointment, which the latter does. She arrives with the genuine paper, just too late. The colonel has gone to fill an appointment in the service of his Creator.

THE FACE OR THE VOICE (Nov. 5).—Beauty is only skin deep, but it certainly attracts people, and that is the reason Undine Borden always secures the attention of others. Her sister Myna, is not so fair to look upon, but she possesses a cultivated voice. Robert Hale, passing their home, hears Myna singing. He listens attentively, and after she has finished, Undine happens to come to the window. He bows to her and through this incident, they become acquainted. He woos her and every time he calls to see her, asks her to sing, but she always evades his request. Finally, she arranges with Myna to deceive Mr. Hale. She tells him that she will sing for him in the choir-loft of the village church and her sister Myna will play the organ for her while he sits in one of the pews below. This plan is carried out. While she stands at the choir-rail in the choir-loft. Myna not only plays, but sings. M. Hale is so impressed by Undine's accomplishment, his admiration is unbounded. Myna wanders away by herself into the woods and alone she sings the song.

Hale is passing through the woods and hears the sweet notes of Myna's song. He hastens to her side and there learns for himself the deception perpetrated upon him. He is not long in rejecting Undine and declaring his intention of marrying her sister, Myna.

MICHAEL McSHANE, MATCHMAKER (Nov. 6).—Dan O'Toole is a man bordering on 40, much older than Colleen O'Brien, with whom he is very much in love. Her parents consider him an overgrown booby and through their denunciations, she is led to believe he lacks courage and manliness in affairs of the heart.

Discouraged and disheartened, Dan applies to Michael McShane, the itinerant peddler. He advises him to assert himself and show Colleen who's who. The two men concoct a little scheme. Dan presents Colleen with a little pig, which she refuses to accept, but Dan insists upon her keeping it, finds fault with her and is so pronounced in having his own way that the girl is greatly surprised. To cap the climax, he tells her they are going to be married, and she will be his wife. She tells him she likes his impudence, and refuses to consent. As prearranged, Michael McShane's donkey, hitched to the little cart is standing nearby. Dan brings it into commission, grasps Colleen around the waist, places the pig in her arms, and they are on their way to the priest's before she knows it,, very much to the delight of the good-natued and resourceful Michael McShane, matchmaker.

OUT OF THE SHADOWS (Nov. 7).—For years, Cara has waited for the return of the man she loves, Herbert Fowler. Living alone, she has busied herself in deeds of charity and acts of kindness among her neighbors, and is beloved by all. At the death of one of the inhabitants of the town, she adopts his orphaned daughter, and makes her a companion. The child is now grown to young womanhood and is a source of much happiness to Cara, who rejoices when the girl is courted by one of the village swains. Cara has almost given up when, unexpectedly, Herbert comes back. She welcomes him gladly.

Virginia, her adopted charge, is engaged to Donald Wilson. In her ecstacy, she meets Herbert, and tells him of it. He tenderly clasps her in his arms, and kises her. Cara sees him and at once comes to the conclusion that he is making love to Virginia, forgetting his vows to her. When Virginia appears and shows her "aunt" her engagement ring and tells her that "Uncle" Herbert was the first to congratulate her with a kiss, Cara feels abashed and apologizes to Herbert for her undue jealousy and promises never to distrust him again.

A MODERN ATALANTA (Nov. 8).—Fresh from her college matriculation, Ruth Grantland returns to her country home. She is courted by two of the village beaux, who propose marriage. She likes the boys, but not sufficiently to marry them. Her preference is for Jack Hall, a young man of extreme culture and refinement. She tells the two boys that she will consent to marry them if they can beat her in a foot-race, taking each one on separately. They agree, and she, being fleet of foot, runs away from them, crossing the line far in the lead. Jack, riding horseback, happens along and takes in the fun. Later, he proposes to Ruth. She makes the same proposition she made to the boys. This is agreeable to Jack, although he is a little bit afraid of Ruth's showing in her previous contests. He plans with the boys, who know they are out of the running for Ruth's hand, to drive their cow across Ruth's pathway during the race. They do it, and Jack wins easily. When the boys put in an appearance, Ruth suspects their trickery, but does not find any fault because she has lost to the man who is anxious to win her and she is only too happy to have for a husband. The boys congratulate the happy pair and wish them all sorts of good luck.

THE HANDBAG (Nov. 9).—For a society lady, visiting cards are quite essential. Accordingly, Miss De Rosville, unencumbered, repairs to the stationer's to secure the cards which she had previously ordered. She puts them into her hand bag and on her way home, loses it. A young girl finds the bag and goes on her way rejoicing. She boards a street-car and notices a young man looking at her very intently. His glances are embarrasing, and when she leaves the car, she forgets to take the handbag from the seat beside her. The young man examines the contents of the bag and finds in it Amanda DeRosville's cards. Hurriedly going to his home, he dresses himself in his classiest raiment, hails a taxi and calls at the address given on the cards. He is ushered into the reception room of a very elegant home and asks for Miss DeRosville. When the maid tells Amanda that a young man is awaiting her, she hastens to the parlor, all a-flutter. The young man is so shocked at not meeting the fair one of the street car, and is so upset by the coquettish grimaces of the old spinster, he can scarcely listen to her explanations of how she lost her handbag. He loses no time in getting out of the house.

ARABIAN SPORTS (Nov. 9).—People of this section of the country are apt to associate Arabia with some far-distant point with customs and manners past finding out. Whatever our ideas have been, we are thoroughly enlightened in regard to the sports and pastimes of the Arabian people in this particularly interesting and instructive film. We are brought right into contact with the people in the midst of their life and pleasures and they are wonderful to behold. The Arabs are remarkable athletes, and create no end of surprise at their astonishing performances.

ESSANAY.

"CHAINS" (Nov. 5)—The story concerns the love of Ruth Keene, a beautiful young girl, for Harry Madden, a handsome and presumably upright and conscientious fellow. On the eve of their engagement Madden becomes entangled in a card game with some dissolute companions in the loft of a barn, detects one of their number in the act of cheating, a quarrel ensues and Madden, in the struggle, kills the man with his own revolver. Crazed with fear he attempts to escape and is captured in Ruth's home, where he seeks protection. The result of the trial is a sentence of fifteen years in the penitentiary. Ruth's innocent love now causes her to do a strange thing. She marries Madden in the jail, in spite of the protests of friends and the clergyman, and swears to be ever faithful until he comes back to her. Securing a position in the office of Robert King, a wealthy young lawyer, Ruth finds that King loves her dearly and desires to make her his wife. Gradually a kindred love springs up within her—a love that she battles against desperately, but in vain. King reveals his love, and the wretched girl is forced to confess her marriage and the fact that her husband is a convict serving time for murder. King begs her to divorce Madden. With a new hope for freedom, Ruth journeys to the penitentiary and is shocked to find Madden now a degenerate, brutal creature who coarsely refuses to consent to a divorce under any conditions and becomes so violent that the guard has difficulty in removing the girl from the cell. Returning to King she hysterically tells him the hopelessness of their love and he heartbrokenly allows her to go. Chained to the degenerate who languishes in his cell, Ruth stumbles from the room and, with the awful truth ringing in her ears; "Until death do us part," gropes her way blindly into the unknown future that stretches blackly before her.

A MONEY! (Nov. 6).—Cal and Billy, two young chaps, turn over their money to their friend Steppling for safe keeping, and he promises to allow them a certain amount each day. Next day the two boys meet some charming girls and, not having enough money to entertain them, hurry home and beg Steppling to let them have some on account. He refuses and goes to sleep while they rave. Seeing his clothes on the chair they hit on a scheme, hurry to a pawn shop and pawn the clothes for a couple of dollars. Steppling awakens, finds his clothes gone, and is horrified. Securing a suit much too small for him, he takes some old suits of clothes belonging to the boys and pawns them to get money. This, in his excitement, he drops on the sidewalk. Reaching home he meets the boys, who laughingly tell him about pawning his clothes, then are dumbfounded when Steppling frantically explains that their money was sewed in the lining of his coat. Immediately the boys rush to the pawn shop, but find the suit has been purchased by an unknown party. Returning home they are further knocked out to find that Steppling has also lost the money he got for the pawned clothes. Meanwhile, the man who bought Steppling's suit discards it on reaching home, and it is thrown out on the ash heap. A tramp finds it, puts it on, and applies at the house, where Cal, Billy and Steppling are doing menial house work to get some money. They instantly recognize the clothes, and the poor tramp is put through a strenuous ordeal as they pull the togs from him and triumphantly wave the recovered money as they kick him out the door.

THE RANCHMAN'S ANNIVERSARY (Nov. 7).—Jake Simpson, a ranchman, is celebrating his wedding anniversary. Through the ranch house window the boys see him fondly kiss his good wife and Bill Todd hits on a corking good scheme to fool the old man and make him jealous. Bill takes Edith Simpson into his confidence, and she promises to help him fool her father. That evening she persuades her mother to visit a neighboring ranch, and thus gets her out of the way. Bill now dons a feminine disguise as near like Mrs. Simpson as possible, then gets one of the cowboys to make love to him, and stands with his back to the ranch house window, Edith and one of the boys now slip into the house where old Simpson is asleep, substitute blank cartridges in his revolver, then send another of the boys in to tell the old man that his wife is false to him. Gazing through the window he sees the disguised Todd in the cowboy's arms, grabs his gun, rushes out, fires, and the cowboy falls. In a panic of fear Simpson hurries back to the ranch house, leaves a note for his wife, mounts his horse and gallops to catch the first train East. The note is found by Edith and the boys, just as Mrs. Simpson returns, and a wild ride ensues to head off the old man and explain the joke. Simpson boards the train and the cowboys, not to be outdone, race with the train and beat it to the next station. Hustling Simpson out of the coach they take him back to the ranch house, where the joke is explained. Promising to never suspect his good wife again, Simpson takes her in his arms while the boys give them a rousing cheer.

WHEN WEALTH TORMENTS (Nov. 8).—Mrs. Mahoney has a charming daughter, Maggie, who is loved by Jim O'Brien, a stalwart young chap. Mrs. Mahoney is only too glad to accept Jim's attentions to Maggie until one day she receives a telegram stating that a deceased uncle has left her a fortune of half a million. Immediately Jim is ordered to keep away from the house and Mrs. Mahoney moves both herself and Maggie into a fashionable hotel. Maggie is heartbroken at the loss of Jim, and secretly manages to se him on several occasions, but always to be found out by her watchful mother, who drives poor Jim away. A friend now proposes a scheme to Jim to cure Mrs. Mahoney of her airs. Jim has heard her declare that Maggie shall marry a foreign title, so he sends his friend to her as a matrimonial agent representing a French count and a German baron, both of whom Mrs. Mahoney is eager to see. Thereupon, Jim disguises first as the count and calls. Maggie is disgusted with his actions until he reveals his identity, then she aids him in carrying out his plan. Jim's manners are shocking, and Mrs. Mahoney finally orders him out. Rigging himself out as the baron, Jim calls an hour later and proceeds to still further disgust the frantic Mrs. Mahoney with his actions until she drives him away and bemoans the fact that poor Jim is now lost to Maggie forever. Removing his disguise in the hall, Jim quickly returns in his true character and Mrs. Mahoney is so thoroughly cured of desiring foreign titles that she readily consents to a renewal of the engagement, entirely unsuspicious of the trickery that has been played on her.

AN INDIAN'S FRIENDSHIP (Nov. 9).—Broncho is instrumental in saving Yellow Wolf, an Indian, from the wrath of Dan Runnion, a surly cowpuncher, and Runnion swears revenge. His chance comes when he sees a notice from the county sheriff advising that cattle rustlers are at work and for ranchmen to watch their stock. Finding one of Broncho's shirts out on the clothesline, Runnion places an incriminating note in the pocket and steals away. Getting the ranchman, he returns to Broncho's shack and accuses him of being one of the rustlers. The ranchman finds the note in the pocket of Broncho's shirt advising Broncho to come and get his share of the proceeds from the stolen cattle. In a rage he summons his cowboys and Broncho is led away to be hanged. Meanwhile, Yellow Wolf, who has witnessed Runnion writing the incriminating note and heard his threat to get even with Broncho, rides madly to town, summons the sheriff, and they arrive in time to prevent the hanging of Broncho. Yellow Wolf tells the story and the guilty Runnion tries to escape, but is captured and meets his just deserts, while the boys gladly congratulate Broncho on his narrow escape.

A BABY'S SHOE (Nov. 1).—When Dr. Wilton had waited for his buggy ten minutes, he became impatient. A moment later, when Forest drove up the curb, Dr. Wilton informed him that to be late again would mean dismissal. Dr. Wilton determined to buy an automobile. The next week one was installed, and, of course, Forest lost his job.

Months go by. The fruitless search for work has discouraged Forest, who determines to rob the doctors house. His thoughts are interrupted by his child. She wants him to play with her. She consents to hide her face while he hides her shoe in his pocket. The game is interrupted by his wife, who informs him that the rent collector has called several times.

That night Forest gains access to the doctor's house and proceeds to fill his pockets with the doctor's silverware. While cleaning out his pocket he pulls out his baby's shoe. Slowly he realizes what he is about to do. He sees in a vision his wife questioning the child about the missing shoe. Dr. Wilton, who has heard a noise, enters. He is dumbfounded at what he sees, but appearing to understand the situation, he silently withdraws. Forest returns home to find his wife waiting for him. She feels instinctively what he has done and searches his pockets, only to find the babys shoe. Slowly she understands, and raising her arms in supplication above, thanks God for the talisman that saved her husband. It is a great surprise to Forest and his wife, when the doctor visits them the next day and offers his ex-coachman the job of driving his car.

BOBBY'S DREAM (Nov. 2).—Bobby and his folks are at the seashore. He finishes a yarn of the sea and falls asleep soon after. In his dreams he is with the acquaintances of his finished book. Pirates seem to rise out of the sea, dash up the beach and kidnap his family, but by dint of strategy on Bobby's part, he manages to make his escape from the crew. Soon we see him come alone in a dory, rowing and looking for the black ship flying the pirate flag. He sights it and directly he appears over the side of the sombre gunwale. He sees his mother, sister and little brother all huddled in fear and the crew asleep with but one man on guard. He snatches the cutlass from the outlaw and then throws him overboard. All is done so quietly that none of the others are awakened. When the captain and crew awake they give chase only to be foiled by Bobby, as they try to come after him on the beach. With his revolvers he soon has them tumbling one after another in the sand, and then, in a last desperate conflict—he wakes up.

FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES (Nov. 3).—A college town, as a rule, is the home of practical jokers and it was a college town where Miss Alice Morse, M.D., starts her practice. One day four college students out for a lark see her sign and look upon the idea of a woman doctor as a huge joke. Later on they see some boys playing with a discarded clothing store dummy and decide to play a trick on the female doctor.

Removing the wooden arm from the dummy they repair to their room where Tom has it fastened to his shoulder while the others send Dr. Alice Morse a hurry call to set Tom's broken arm. She arrives in due time, makes a hasty examination and proves herself equal to the occasion by gravely announcing the case to be a serious one; she quickly departs to bring her "surgical instruments," and at the same time requests her brother, a powerful athlete, to accompany her. The college boys gleefully chuckle over the success of their practical joke, but when they see the female doctor upon her return calmly and deliberately mending Tom's broken arm with a saw, hammer and nails, they are at first amazed and then nonplussed. The climax is reached when she presents her bill for professional services rendered. The astounded students now try to explain it was only a joke, but she cannot see it in that light. Her big brother takes a hand and by a most convincing argument compels them to pay the bill in good, hard cash.

THE NEW MEMBER OF THE LIFE SAVING CREW (Nov. 4).—Ruth Harding, the daughter of Captain Harding, of the Life Saving Station, is loved by George Thompson, the village postmaster. His affections are not returned as Ruth loves Henry Wilson, a young fisherman.

Henry joins the crew under Ruth's father and George realizes that unless he can discredit Henry in some way all hope of his ever winning Ruth is gone. The opportunity soon comes in the person of his sister, who is visiting the village for the first time, and who is unknown to both Ruth and Henry. She is induced to go with her brother to the Life Saving Station as a visitor, and is introduced as such with a request that she be shown over the station. The captain delegates Henry to be her guide. Meantime, George has gone up the beach to the end of the surfman's patrol, and stationed himself with a kodak at a point which he and his sister had pre-arranged.

After being shown over the station the sister requests Henry to show her the patrol. Arriving at the appointed spot her brother gives a signal and she falls into Henry's arms in a pretended faint. George quickly snaps his kodak and the damage is done. The girl quickly recovers and Henry soon forgets the incident.

The following morning George puts the picture into an envelope and gives it to Ruth when she calls at the post office for the mail. He follows her and sees that it has the desired effect, i. e., a quarrel between the lovers.

Henry, on duty in the watch tower, sees a figure clinging to an upturned boat at sea, and, having seen George last in oilskins, thinks it is he, but knowing of his treachery, he is tempted to rid himself of him by allowing him to drown. His manhood quickly asserts itself, however, and he gives the alarm.

The life boat is launched and a rescue is made when Henry dives just as the figure sinks. Instead of his rival Henry has saved his sweetheart, who had gone rowing after their quarrel. The lovers are again united and when George's treachery is discovered he receives a good ducking at the hands of the crew.

A ROMANCE OF THE RAILS (Nov. 5).—Old Silas Barton has lived many years in a cottage owned by the Central and Southern Railroad. Having had no use for the property the company has paid no attention to it, but when a new spur is contemplated Barton is ordered to vacate. He refuses, and the legal department of the road threatens to eject him. Frank Denning, assistant to the superintendent, is sent as the company's representative. He meets Barton's niece, and tells her of his mission. Denning and Alice, in time, learn to love each other and he is a steady caller, but always unknown to the uncle. When Barton is handed the notice of ejectment he foolishly connects the agent Denning with the order and threatens revenge on him. He has heard Denning tell Alice that he has business further up the road, but will return on his velocipede later. The old man locks the doors and nails the windows down—takes his revolver and starts out to revenge himself upon the young man by shooting him from under the bridge. Alice breaks through the window and follows. As Barton crosses the high trestle his foot goes through the ties and his leg is broken, just as the express is due. Denning, returning from up the track, sees his plight from a distance, races to him and carries him to safety just as the train rushes by. The shock is fatal to Barton and he succumbs, but not before realizing his unfairness toward Denning, and giving Alice his hoarded wealth as he joins her hand to that of the man she loves.

A QUEEN FOR A DAY (Nov. 6).—The black savages in the wilds of Africa should be taught a religion so Deacon Jones claims, and, being a missionary, he starts for Africa with his daughter and her fat, colored maid. On the same ship is a party of young men bound for the same spot on a hunting expedition. One of the young men falls in love with the missionary's daughter, and she with him, but their courtship is broken off abruptly when they reach the shores of their destination.

In a lonely pass the missionary, his daughter, and maid are captured by a band of Zulus, and are taken to the camp before their chief. The latter falls in love with the colored maid and compels her to become Queen of the Zulus. While the ceremonies are in progress the young suitor is brought in a captive. After a brief council the Zulus determine to put the white captive to death. The new Queen signifies her desire to be executioner. This is granted by the chief. She manages by a clever ruse to lead the captives uninjured to freedom. Their escape is soon discovered by the Zulus, who pursue them and almost recapture them. After several hair-breadth escapes, they arrive safely at the mission, where a

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK, WYOMING, U. S. A. (Nov. 8).—"For the benefit and enjoyment of the people" are the words engraved in stone over the huge archway that is the entrance to our National Park. These words sprung from the lips of Cornelius Hedges on the night of September 19th, 1870.

In viewing the pictures one is taken through the regular route going through the park today, from the entrance at Gardner, Mont., through the "Golden Gate," to the grandeur of the Grand Canyon. Hell's Half Acre, the Firehole and Old Faithful, Riverside, and the Castle Geyser are all shown in action. Views of the park hotels, such as Old Faithful Inn, the largest log structure in the world, and one of the most unique hotels in existence are also shown. But all these marvels of interest are dwarfed in comparison with the Grand Canyon, the Upper and Lower Falls, the awe-inspiring view from Artist Point, and the spot on the edge of the yawning chasm with the river trickling below.

A DOCTOR FOR AN HOUR (Nov. 9).—In Totville the invalids are much disturbed because, since the death of Dr Fairthorn there has been no doctor in the village, but upon learning from the Widow Fairthorn that a Dr. Martin will arrive they brighten up somewhat.

Dr. Martin arrives in due time, but misses the omnibus that runs from the railroad station to Totville. As there are no other vehicles at hand, he sets out to walk, carrying his medicine case. On the way he passes a stream of water, and decides to take a swim. While he is enjoying his cool bath a tramp steals his clothes and medicine case. The doctor envelopes himself in an old empty barrel and gives chase. The fleet-footed tramp, however, is soon out of sight, leaving the poor doctor to wander about in his wooden bathrobe. The tramp in the doctor's outfit arrives in Totville, and is welcomed by the Widow Fairthorn, who mistakes him for Dr. Martin. He is installed in her late husband's office, and is almost immediately besieged by the invalids of the village. He keeps up the deception and has a series of ludicrous adventures with the patients. Dr. Martin is finally rescued by a farmer, who provides him with an ill-fitting suit of clothes. He manages to reach the widow's home in time to denounce the tramp as an impostor.

MOUNTAIN DEW (Nov. 4).—Old Man Hardy persists in conducting an illicit still in the mountains. The United States Revenue Department knows Hardy is at work, but finds it difficult to trap the wily moonshiner. Officer Lane is sent out to obtain the necessary evidence and to capture Hardy and his men. Arriving on the ground, the officer soon detects the trail, but is seen by a lookout and promptly shot. Hardy's daughter, Mary, while on an errand, discovers the wounded revenue officer and brings him to her home. As Lane convalesces, he falls in love with his rescuer, but is shocked to learn that the man he has been hunting is Mary's father.

Having failed in his mission, Lane is discharged by his chief when he returns and another officer is sent to round up the lawbreakers. Smarting under the disgrace, Lane hastens to the mountains and induces the moonshiners to destroy their still and give up their illegal operations. When the officer arrives he concludes from the dismantled still that the moonshiners have left the country and carries that information to his superior. Lane determines to cast his lot with the mountaineers and wins the hand of Mary.

THE MYSTERY OF GRANDFATHER'S CLOCK (Nov. 6).—George Morse pays the last instalment on his farm and receives his deed. Thirty years later we find that the old farmer has passed away and his son has become a successful business man in the city. Morse, Jr., has furnished his house with several articles which belonged to his father, including an old clock, in which he takes a great deal of pride.

The clock becomes out of order and Morse instructs a young clockmaker to attend to the necessary repairs. When the young man calls he establishes a bond of friendship with Morse's daughter, Nellie. In the succeeding weeks Nellie stops the clock on several occasions, in order that the young man may call.

Morse, however, has other plans for Nellie and wishes her to marry one of his business acquaintances, James Cleveland, an attorney. Cleveland learns of the frequent stopping of the clock and becomes suspicious when he oversees the pleasant relations between Nellie and Westcott, the young repair man. He, therefore, induces Morse to engage an old clockmaker to make the repairs.

Morse wishes to dispose of the old farm, but is unable to locate the deed. Cleveland informs him that the papers must be found without delay, but their search is fruitless.

One evening Nellie gives a party and Wescott, who has not been invited because of Morse's prejudice, appears on the scene. Hearing her father's voice, Nellie has Wescott hide in the clock. The affair is seen by Wescott who informs Morse. Wescott holds the door of the clock and when Morse endeavors to extricate the young man, the old clock falls over. The long lost deed falls out of a little hidden drawer at the top of the clock. Delighted at the recovery of the valuable papers, Morse consents to Nellie's marriage to Wescott.

THE PONY EXPRESS GIRL (Nov. 8).—Two desperadoes plan to rob the pony express and their plot is overheard by May, the girl at the station. May rides after her sweetheart, the express rider, and overtakes him just as he is assaulted by the robbers. Holding the two desperadoes at bay, she picks up the express bag and dashes away to deliver it. At the relay station she warns the officials, who ride back to apprehend the robbers, while she continues her journey. Upon the completion of her mission, May returns to the wounded messenger, and when he recovers a happy wedding takes place.

STENOGRAPHER WANTED (Nov. 8).—Smith & Smith (father and son) advertise for a stenographer. A pretty young girl, bearing the name of Minnie, applies for the position and secures it. Father and son both are impressed with the new stenographer, and in consequence business is neglected.

At home that night both father and son send, independently, identical notes to Miss Minnie, asking if they may call that evening, and merely signing the name, Smith. When the notes arrive Minnie concludes they are from the same person, who is over-anxious to make an appointment, and she writes on the back of each, "Sure. Come right along, Mr. Smith." As a result both father and son arrive at nearly the same time and it is a case of "two is company, three a crowd."

Shortly after their arrival, a fine-looking young man carrying a suitcase enters the rooms and Miss Minnie proceeds to throw herself into his arms. The newcomer announces, "I'm back from the Polar expedition, wifey, and you wont have to work any more." It is needless to say father and son beat a hasty retreat.

THE FRAUD AT THE HOPE MINE (Nov. 9).—The directors of the company operating the Hope Mine suspect a leakage in ore and send young Gause to investigate. Arriving on the scene, Gause and Merry, the pretty stenographer at the office, become friends. In looking over the property Gause determines to explore an old shaft.

A week later Gause learns that ore is being shipped away at night, but while he is securing evidence the investigator is over-powered in the dark shaft and left unconscious.

In an endeavor to imprison Gause the mine foreman explodes a section of the mine, causing a cave-in. Merry, in the meantime, has suspected that all is not well with her sweetheart and organizes a rescue party. Gause is liberated, the dishonest superintendent is exposed and the mystery of the Hope Mine is cleared up.

BIOGRAPH.

HEREDITY (Nov. 4).—At the edge of the Indian village, where the renegade white man is occupied with trading, he meets the Indian maid, who later becomes his purchased bride. A son is born. Playing with his kind the child, who inherits his mother's Indian character, passes on to boyhood. Then the racial difference between the father and son is felt. At length the father, angered at the reluctance of the youth to leave his people and accompany him on a trading trip, compels the boy to do so by threats and violence, but later during the journey he becomes ashamed of his Indian wife and child. Broken guns and bad whisky, sold to the Indians by the trader, inflame their desire for vengeance. In the coming attack the war-cry of his ancestors stirs the young Indian's blod. The father's crimes prove his own destruction, while the boy and his mother are claimed by their own.

HIS AUTO'S MAIDEN TRIP (Nov. 7).—Jinx buys a runabout and takes his wife out for a trial spin. Further down the road are two tramps, who, considering that living by their wits is better than working, scheme to make it appear that the auto has disabled one of them. The auto is stopped, and, assisting the apparently injured man into it, Jinx and his wife drive him to their house, considering that taking care of him there will be cheaper than sending him to the hospital. This proves a Paradise for the tramp, but the clouds soon gather in the shape of the Copper on the beat who has had a past acquaintance with him.

THE CLUB MAN AND THE CROOK (Nov. 7).—Mr. Billings wants to go to the club. Mrs. Billings says "nay," and stations herself in a chair at the door that her husband may not escape. Later in the evening sleep overtakes her and Billings sneaks out, indulges in a quiet game and, returning home, manages to turn a sinister condition into one of beatific sunshine.

A MAMMA WANTED (Oct. 30).—Two little, motherless children have an advertisement inserted in a daily paper, announcing a vacancy in their home for a woman to take the place of their own mother. George Moran, the father of the children, is surprised when he comes home one evening to find his little parlor crowded with a variety of womenkind. He waves them all aside with laugh and tells the children that there is only one girl whom he could accept as their stepmother, and he shows them her picture. The children recognise the picture and in a moment they return escorting the young lady of his desire. Great is the children's delight when their father holds the girl in his arms.

JIM'S PARTNER (Oct. 31).—Jim Fuller, a mining prospector, takes a stranger into partnership with him, and shelters him under his roof. Like many husbands, Jim had completely forgotten that his wife is still in love with him and he shows her no particular attention. The stranger, however, sees that something is wrong and it is not long until the weak wife is completely under his influence and has consented to elope with him. She leaves behind her a note to Jim explaining that his inattention to her has driven her from home. The trail away from home includes many dangerous passes. At one of these the burro bearing the woman makes a misstep. She is plunged to the bottom of a gully and badly injured. The stranger proves his worth by hurrying away from the helpless woman, knowing that Jim will soon be hot on the trail. Jim arrives on the scene with murder in his heart, but the sight of his wife's suffering makes too eloquent an appeal and Jim realizes that he is, in a measure, responsible for it.

WIFEY'S INVESTMENT (Nov. 2).—To show her husband her ability as a business woman, Mrs. Robertson purchases a seashore lot on which to build a summer camp. That the captivating personalities of the two real estate men overbalanced her judgment is apparent to her husband. He says nothing, but awaits developments. He has not long to wait, for the rising tide wakes him at dawn, and he and his good wife flounder around in four feet of water. Mrs. Robertson weeps in disappointment, but soothingly he tells her that the property has one advantage in that it will keep them cool all summer, if they stay.

BROKEN HEARTS (Nov. 6).—The sale of his copper mine, although the happiest event in the life of Jim Brooks, came near to proving the saddest. His attempt to surprise his wife arouses her suspicion and becoming heart-broken over what she considered her husband's faithlessness she attempted suicide. Jim's Indian man servant drags her from the railroad track just as the train thunders past. Brooks returns from the city loaded down with presents for his wife, only to find a note of rebuke from her. All his dreams of happiness are shattered in a moment, but the Indian succeeds in bringing the estranged couple together, and, after a word of explanation, they settle down to enjoy their good fortune.

VICTIMS OF FATE (Nov. 7).—Lieut. Somers, military attache to the American Embassy, at Japan, marries a Japanese girl and they live happily until the lieutenant is ordered back to America. His wife, of course, expects to return with him, but he informs her that their marriage must terminate in the regular course, provided for by Japanese custom. The girl is broken-hearted. Her brother, Count Nidsuka, calls at her home after the lieutenant has gone to the United States, but finds only her body and a note explaining that her husband has forsaken her. The Japanese vows vengeance.

When Somers returns to Washington he renews his acquaintance with the pretty daughter of General Meeker and they are soon to be married. Count Nidsuka, who has followed the lieutenant from Japan, presents his card to General Meeker, and tells him of the lieutenant's action and the tragedy which it caused. The General is furious, for Somers has been courting his daughter, and he calls Somers before him. The lieutenant, confronted by the Japanese, confesses his duplicity and surrenders his sword.

DINAN—FRANCE (Nov. 7).—The beautiful scenes in this quaint old town are conveyed to the audience in an excellent manner by artistic coloring and superb photography.

BUSTER TO THE RESCUE (Nov. 9).—Mrs. Morton, a widow, is in charge of the Postoffice in Blissville, Arizona. The office is visited one day by two desperadoes who bind and gag Mrs. Morton and her baby daughter, but her young son, Buster, gets away and hurries to summon the sheriff. In order that the crime will be covered, the bandits set fire to the house, but, with Buster in the lead, the sheriff and his posse return, rescue Mrs. Morton and the little girl, extinguish the blaze, and, with the assistance of a faithful dog, trace and capture the two desperadoes.

C. G. P. C.

WHIFFLES, CUBIC ARTIST (Oct. 29).—Whiffles, the popular comedian, in the role of an artist, fosters the theory that beauty lies in sharp angles rather than in delicate contours. His efforts to convince his prospective father-in-law that he has the right idea are highly amusing.

DINAN, FRANCE (Colored) (Oct. 29).—The beautiful scenes in this quaint old town are conveyed to the audience in an excellent manner by artistic coloring and superb photography.

A TRAGEDY AT THE COURT OF MILAN (Nov. 1).—A tragedy based upon a happening in Italian history in which a young and beautiful widow marries the faithless Duke of Milan. To save a friendly chevalier, the duchess makes a false confession, but her sacrifice fails in its purpose, and after the young fellow has paid the death penalty, the returning executioners find that the shock has caused her death also.

ANNE BOLEYN (Nov. 5).—An epoch-making occurrence and one of the most important in all history is herein recounted with a faithfulness to detail which makes it tense, dramatic and entertaining. The perfect coloring gives the atmosphere of grandeur which is prevalent in the palaces of Kings. It is the story of King Henry VIII, of England, and his infatuation for Anne Boleyn, which resulted in the founding of a new religion.

HALF A PINT OF MILK (Nov. 8).—The adventures of an awkward husband in securing a pint of milk for the baby as shown in this film, are highly amusing and the leading role is well played by a clever comedian.

THE SCARAB (Nov. 8).—An interesting study of a very useful insect at its work.

A TRIP UP THE ELBE (Nov. 8).—A little journey up the beautiful Elbe, which is the rendezvous for the pleasure seekers of Central Germany.

SELIG.

THE FISHERBOY'S FAITH (Oct. 28).—Ferdinand loves Amanda of the island, but the offer of a well-to-do relation of hers, to educate her, takes her to the mainland. The new vistas of life enchant her and her letters to him continue less frequent until they stop entirely. Ferdinand enlists in the navy and Amanda, who has become engaged to a city man, visits her modest old home and expresses herself as bored. Ferdinand happens to pay one last visit to the island at the same time, and saves from drowning the fiancé of Amanda. When he learns of her engagement, he bids them both goodbye forever.

JIM'S VINDICATION (Oct. 29).—Many adventures of the West cling about the doings of the pony express riders. One of these riders is doped by a dose of morphine and robbed. A jury at trial convicts him of robbery and he is sentenced to serve time. His friends enable him to escape, having a string of faithful horses at command. During this flight for freedom, he encounters the real criminal and runs him down.

A HEART IN RAGS (Oct. 30).—A little girl playing hide and seek with her playmates near a railway switch, climbs into a box-car to hide. The train pulls out and carries her away. Her playmates report her loss and her parents begin to hunt for her. In the interim, Pittsburg Bill, a happy bobo, who is stealing a ride in the same car, discovers the little girl, Rosie, and proceeds to entertain her by going through all sorts of foolish performances. When the train comes to a standstill the pair fall into a hobo camp and one of the disreputables attempts to steal Rosie from Bill and hold her for ransom. This starts a fight and results in the town constables and a posse raiding the camp. Finding Bill fleeing with the child in his arms, they assume he is a kidnappper and shoot him. He falls, fatally wounded by the railway track, just as an auto, bearing Rosie's parents, comes upon the scene and she is restored to their arms. She is duly grateful and not forgetful, and clears the faithful Bill of any stigma, and he dies happy.

HER BITTER LESSON (Oct. 31).—Aurora Floyd elopes from boarding school with John Conyers, but hardly a week has elapsed before she discovers that she has married a worthless libertine. She appeals to her father for aid and advice, and he finally pays Conyers to leave the country for a year, so that she can secure a divorce on the ground of desertion. She returns to her home town and realizes that her girlhood sweetheart, John Mellish, is the man she really loves. Upon hearing the report of Conyer's death, she promises to become the wife of Mellish. Just as the marriage is about to be consummated, Conyers appears and proceeds to blackmail her, until death relieves the earth of his presence.

HIS WEDDING EVE (Nov. 1).—Thomas Ellis, on the eve of his wedding, in a very nervous state, is pacing the street two hours before the ceremony, when he bumps into a nurse carrying a child, the girl falling, sprains her ankle. The man finds he not only has a baby, but a girl on hand, and relieves himself of the former by calling an ambulance. In his effort to dispose of the baby, however, he becomes an object of suspicion and is run into the police station. He is extricated from his dilemma after a most anxious hour, and arrives in church just in time to save his prospective bride from nervous prostration.

THE VOICE OF WARNING (Nov. 4).—Mrs. Ryan is one of those hard-working mothers of the city tenement districts, who work for their more fortunate sisters of the upper or monied class. Mrs. Ryan is employed in the home of Mrs. Martin. She is discharged by Mrs. Martin because of an accident in which a rug is injured. After a vain struggle to secure other employment by which she can support her little daughter and herself, she is taken sick and both mother and daughter face starvation. Myra, the child, starts out in a final effort to secure food. She tries every method that occurs to her little mind, but all of them fail to secure the necessary food. At last, she, in her necessity, yields to a strong temptation and appropriates a box of groceries intended for Mrs. Martin. On her way home with the stolen property she stops to listen to the exhortions of a street preacher, who has chosen for his sermon on that particular occasion, the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal." The talk of the minister is so convincing that the child repents her action, and returns the box of eatables to the home of Mrs. Martin. That lady, on hearing the child's story, is also repentant and having heard the voice of warning, she accompanies Myra to the tenement building and after providing for Mrs. Ryan, assures her that her old position will be waiting for her when she is able to return.

HER EDUCATION (Nov. 6).—"The Kid," known by no other name, is a daughter of the range and pal of the rough, big hearted men that ride it. Her father meets his death in an attempt to protect her from the insults of a repulsive saloonkeeper. Before his death "The Kid's" father insists, to her utter horror, that she secure above all other things, an education. After the killing "The Kid" follows and shoots the saloonkeeper and then, absolutely alone, with only a few dollars, she sets out on horseback to fulfill her father's dying wish by gaining entrance to the State University. While riding along a precipice her horse stumbles and she is thrown to the ledge below, where she lies unconscious until Joe Emory, a young Irish sheep herder, finds her and nurses her back to life. Two happy weeks are spent together by the young couple, so strangely introduced, and sad are their hearts when the time for parting comes, for "The Kid" is determined to carry out her father's last desire.

She arrives at the University finally, and in company with a new found cowboy friend she applies for admission to the "learnin' factory." The faculty refuse her request, and her cowboy friend proceeds to lick the whole bunch of "wisdom pilots" one by one. "The Kid" and her pal are arrested, but are later set free and she loses no time in getting back to the range and Joe Emory.

CARMEN OF THE ISLES (Nov. 7).—Like the Carmen of story, the girl was seductively attractive, and as heartless in her coquetry. She was wooed and loved by a young fisherman, whose frequent trips to the fishing grounds gave her ample opportunity to use her wiles on whomever was inclined to succumb. Returning from one trip unexpectedly, his eyes were opened to her perfidy. He first vented his righteous rage on her lover—a man whom he had befriended; and then upon her. Their final quarrel took place on the summit of a high cliff, over which she accidentally fell and was dashed to death on the rocks below.

THE LEGEND OF THE LOST ARROW (Nov. 8).—This story is one of the picturesque and ever sad Indian legends that survive, even at this date, in the valley of Yosemite. Yosemite—the valley in which the young brave Koo-Su-Kah and his beautiful sweetheart, Tee-Hee-Nay, met their strange fate, and straightway became part of the appealing mythology of that wonderful valley. The Indians of Yosemite believe that the spirits of this couple still wander over the meadows of the "Lost Arrow."

Upon their betrothal day, Koo-Su-Kah resolved to go hunting on the heights nearby, in order to supply game for the wedding feast. The young brave promised his wife to be that he would shoot an arrow from the cliff as a token of his success with the deer hunt, a feather was to be bound to the arrow for each buck that he had brought down. But in shooting the arrow Koo-Su-Kah's foot slipped on the ledge and he was dashed to the ledge far below. Tee-Hee-Nay, becoming impatient, climbed up, and discovering his body, summoned his young companions and had them lower her by means of a rope of tamarack boughs to the body of her loved one. She was able to bring the body to the top, but when she saw that her lover was dead she threw herself weeping upon his breast and died. The awestruck Indians, realizing the great love and perfect one between the two, made them honored among memories.

ENCHANTING JAPAN (Nov. 8).—Another of those popular educational subjects showing the beauties of Japan.

RELIANCE.

A BROTHER'S REQUITAL (Nov. 6).—Hector Gray promises his dying mother that he will always be good to her favorite son, Jim. Jim is inclined to be rather wild, but despite this fact, Hector takes him into business and they become partners. Jim is engaged to Edith. Hector meets her and immediately loses his heart to her. Knowing she is Jim's fiance, he loyally conceals his feelings. He gives Jim the company's funds bidding him deposit them. On his way to the vaults Jim meets some of his old companions, and loses the entire amount. Returning home he confesses this to Hector, who instead of turning upon the penitent boy, forgives him. He tells Jim that Edith must never know that it was he who lost the money, and Hector shoulders the blame. When Jim sees Edith he breaks down and tells her the whole story. He soon realizes that Edith loves Hector just as Hector loves her. Realizing his own unworthiness he brings them together and insists upon taking all the blame.

BEDELIA AND THE NEWLYWEDS (Nov. 9).—Anna and Jim, a newly married couple, engage Bedelia to cook for them in their new home. She promises to arrive bright and early, and they get everything ready for her. But she does not put in an appearance until late. When she does arrive she insists upon being shown to her room and given time to change her gown. Returning to the kitchen she refuses to do any work except beousing, and she makes Anuna and Jim wait upon her. She gives Anna a dish of onions to peel and this makes the pretty little bride cry. When they do not work quickly enough to suit her she covers them with flour and dough, and chases them out of the kitchen. They change their clothes and sit down in the dining room expecting a nice meal. But Bedelias sweetheart, the policeman, has called and she forgets all about her cooking. She entertains him lavishly to the best in the house, while the newlyweds are almost fainting with hunger in the next room. Finally she remembers them and loading an immense tray with food she starts to the dining room. She is greeted with great joy, but as she crosses the threshold she catches her foot in the carpet and the whole dinner is flung at the feet of the hungry pair. Jim grabs his hat and taking his wife by the arm goes off to have their first dinner at a restaurant.

CHILD'S LOTTERY (Nov. 5).—A young department store clerk, successful in booking winners, gains a prize of five thousand dollars from a lottery contest. He obtains a ten-day leave of absence from his employer in order to spend his bonanza with a view to seeing, hearing and feeling high life in all its highness. In the course of his prodigality he meets, enamours and becomes enamoured with the daughter of a wealthy manufacturer. His natural graces of deportment enable him to carry on his masquerade successfully. When he discovers that his money is exhausted he writes to his new love and tells her that he cannot call upon her any more, but that if she wishes to know the reason, he can be found in a certain store between the conventional hours. Accompanied by her father, she goes to the store to unravel the mystery where they find our hero handling the yardstick in the most approved style. They do not hold any grudge against him for his erstwhile disguise and later invite him to their home as though he were still a Prince of Pilsen. The girl's father has a liking for the young fellow and wishing to indulge his daughter's weakness for him, accepts him as a son-in-law.

THE EMPEROR'S MESSAGE (Nov. 7).—Napoleon en route to one of his campaigns stops at the castle of a marchioness. Disregarding for the moment the lures of war, he disports himself with the lady and her retinue, in the course of which developing a very friendly feeling for the marchioness. As he goes away to join his command she asks that in the hour of battle he send her a message. As the carnage is about to begin, Napoleon delivers the promised message to a gunner boy and tells him to take it to the haven of his happiness. The gunner-boy is reluctant to leave on the eve of battle. On his way to the marchioness' castle, he is ambushed by the enemy, but faithful to the Emperor, he drags himself wounded, with the love message safe in his bosom. As he delivers it he falls unconscious. The battle won, Napoleon returns to the scene of his pleasures. He finds his lady somewhat cool in her reception. The answer is found in her depression because of the serious illness of the bearer of the Emperor's message, who, to bring pleasure to her had endangered his life. She parts the curtains unveiling the wounded hero as he lies on the bed convalescent. The Emperor signalizes his appreciation by pinning the cross of the Legion of Honor upon the breast of the faithful.

LUX.

ALL THROUGH A BANK NOTE (Oct. 25).—Two friends endeavor to exchange a five-pound note whilst passing one another in the street. As one is on a tramcar and the other is in an auto they manage to tear the note between them. Jones therefore goes to his house and writes his friend telling him to meet him in the park next day when he will return the other half of the note. Smith finally sends his son to keep the appointment and Jones sends his daughter. The young couple have never met before, hence their meeting is highly interesting.

STICK IT JOHN (Oct. 25).—John purchase a new suit and sallies forth to promenade the Strandway. He has purchased a three-penny cigar and, in order to impress upon the passing public that he, John, is smoking a cigar he lights it with much ceremony and omits to see the cauldron of tar which is gaping at his feet, and consequently he falls in. When he emerges, he hastens home, but the journey is fraught with many adventures, for John has become a very tenacious young man and sticks to everything that comes his way.

OH! MY PIPE (Nov. 1).—These few comical scenes only go to prove how dearly every smoker cherishes his beloved pipe. Smithson is taking home a new clay pipe and, even after being flattened out by a massive steam roller, his first thoughts are for the safety of his pipe.

HENPECKED'S BID FOR FREEDOM (Nov. 1).—Henpecked decides to escape from the tyranny of woman's rule. At first he contemplates suicide, but after casting off his hat and coat he comes to the conclusion that it would be unwise to ruin a life so precious. He, therefore, decides to go and make a night of it with the B'hoys, who are delighted to see him.

SOLAX.

THE OLD LOVE AND THE NEW (Nov. 6).—The boy is a bachelor of thirty who by diligence and perseverence is on the road to success. He comes of a poor but hardworking family, his mother being a plain, old-fashioned home-loving body. The boy's success gains him introduction into fashionable and aristocratic circles. He meets the girl and falls in love with her. She is selfish, proud, snobbish, and has a great contempt for her social inferiors. The boy presents her with an engagement ring, and tells her that he wants her to meet his old love, his mother. After many excuses, she finally consents and accompanies him to his mother's cottage. There she views with haughty disdain the humble surroundings and the plain and simple mother who does everything in her power to win her future daughter-in-law's affection. The girl treats the mother like a servant, and rebukes her severely when she accidentally spills some sugar on her dress. The old mother bursts into tears. The boy resents his fiancee's treatment of his mother. She is furious that he should take sides against her, and in a rage demands that he choose between them. He hesitates a moment betwen the old love and the new, and then folds his old mother in his arms.

JUST HATS (Nov. 8).—Billy is a boy who is long in imagination, and short on sense. Billy, on a certain morning incurs the displeasure of the household, by ruining the hat of his sister's beau. The next evening, idiotic Billy puts the family in a turmoil. He comes rushing in from the yard, upsets two buckets of water, and sends things flying around the room just because he happens to see a strange-looking hat on the scarecrow. His parents are disgusted with Billy and turn him out of doors.

Billy goes to the city and has a series of ludicrous adventures, and each of his misfortunes are brought about by troublesome hats. Finally, Billy gets a job in the store of a long-lost cousin. His cousin is a retail hatter, and Billy's importance depends in his ability to deliver hats to customers. Billy sets out, carrying about ten boxes. He has quite a time trying to make connections with cars, ferry-boats, and omnibuses. Then Billy gets an idea. Having seen his cousin fold up some opera hats, Billy decides that all hats could be telescoped. He immediately proceeds to dispense with the boxes, and crushes derbys, silk hats into pancake shape, and puts them all in one box. Billy then finds fault with himself because he hadn't thought of the idea before. Later Billy is at a loss to understand why folks don't take their hats and why they kick him downstairs.

THANHOUSER.

A NOISE LIKE A FORTUNE (Nov. 10).—He was an energetic young farmer, and he realized why he couldn't pay expenses. He needed up-to-date farming implements. He didn't have them, he didn't have the money to buy them, and he had absolutely no credit. It was particularly unfortunate because he was in love with the daughter of the magnate, and the said magnate declined to welcome him as a member of the family.

In desperation the young farmer wrote to a distant cousin, earnestly requesting a loan of $200. In reply he received a letter from the cousin's executors informing him that the old man was dead, and "had left him not one cent." It was also explained the estate of the deceased was valued at $2,000,000.

The farmer threw the letter from him in despair, and decided to go to the city to make a last final hunt for funds. His aged and shrew farmhand came along, saw the letter, picked it up and read it. He suddenly conceived a way to help him. He took the letter, carefully erased the words "not a" and substituted the one important "every." Then he managed to drop the letter just outside the rural railway station, and, as had hoped, the news that the young farmer had inherited $20,000 was soon known by every one in the village. When the farmer returned from the city, disappointed at not having raised the loan, he was surprised and touched by the warmth of his reception. Everyone greeted him cordially, while his father-in-law he hoped for was especially affectionate. The magnate insisted upon loaning him money, and with this cash the young man was enabled to put his farm in good order and have a very profitable year. The magnate grew more and more proud of him and was delighted to find that the young man was still willing to marry the village girl.

As the young farmer was thrifty and uniformly successful, his father-in-law never knew that the $20,000 fortune was simply the result of a farm-hand's skilled use of a pen. The farmhand never told the secret.

THE COUNTY'S PRIZE BABY (Nov. 12).—The wife was happy, for her husband was well-to-do, and she liked living on a farm. The man, however, was ambitious, and the first quarrel of the couple was directly due to the fact that he was sent to the State legislature. At the capital the man met numerous natty officials, and he learned from them how to dress and carry himself in good society. The wife saw the wives of these men, but seemingly had no ambition to be stylishly groomed as these were, in fact. The husband entertained a number of society people one night and was shocked and vexed at the appearance his wife presented. When the guests had departed he scolded her. The woman left her husband's roof an hour later, taking her baby with her, and vowed she would never return to him again. The husband accepted her decision.

Three years later the husband was a Congressman, with his eye on a seat in the United States Senate. In the course of his campaign he attended a country fair. The officials asked him to be judge at the baby show, and he promptly consented.

All sorts of babies were there, and the task of picking out the finest one had elements of difficulty. The Congressman, however, made up his mind very promptly. His eyes lighted on one child and from that moment none of the others could compare with her. She got the blue ribbon. The child's mother, who had lost her in the crowds on the fair grounds, came rushing in at this point and clasped the child in her arms. She then turned to the Congressman, and husband and wife looked into each other's eyes. During the years of separation each had been convinced that the blame was not all on one side, and their beautiful little daughter furnishes an additional reason for reconciliation.

IN TIME OF PERIL (Nov. 15.)—The railroad foreman had a young daughter, and one of their neighbors, a young farmer, fell in love with her. She accepted his attentions, and the course of love seemed smooth until a young civil engineer arrived from the city to take charge of the section of the work on which the girl's father was employed. The engineer was a handsome chap, and he took a fancy to the country girl. She was flattered by his suit, and was gradually weaned away from her country sweetheart.

The girl had a little brother. With him she went one day to where the railroaders were at work and was shyly happy when the engineer proposed that they take a walk so that he could point out what was being accomplished. The boy accompanied them, but soon strolled away, and wandered out on the high trestle which spanned the valley. His departure was unnoticed, and he had nearly reached the middle of the structure before he noticed that a train was rapidly approaching. In an effort to escape he stumbled and fell, and was unable to get out of the way of the engine. The girl saw her brother's terror, and tried to go to his assistance, but was held back by the cowardly engineer, who told her the train was so near that it meant certain death to venture upon the trestle.

In the meantime the young farmer was driving along the road on his way home and was just about to pass under the trestle when he heard the cries from above and realized the child's peril. He climbed up one of the poles of the structure, reaching the top of the trestle when the train was only a few feet away. He seized the helpless boy with one arm, grasped one of the ties with the other, and hung in space while the train crashed along above them.

Later when the boy was returned to his sister, the engineer attempted to explain, but the girl drove away with her country sweetheart.

MAJESTIC.

CUPID ON THE JOB (Nov. 5).—"The Woman Hater's Club" is composed of seven dashing young fellows who have been disappointed in love. "The Man Hater's Club," composed of seven beautiful ladies, hire a house next to the man's club. Universal hatred of the opposite sex is cultivated until sweet little Cupid wakes up one fine morning, and goes forth from his leafy bed in the woods, bent upon mischief. Ethel starts from a nearby city to visit the Woman's Club, but misses her train, and arrives late at night. Cupid arranges things so that she gets into the cellar of the men's club by mistake. She is discovered by the butler and escorted by the horrid men to the woman's club. Cupid sees his chance and works like a beaver. He succeeds in aranging the couples to his liking, and, after four days of hard work, drives them all off to church in a body, where they are married.

HIS DRESS SUIT (Nov. 5).—Handsome Harry is deeply in love with Mabel, who is very fond of flowers. He buys her presents and spends money so freely that he finds himself financially embarrassed, but Mabel must have flowers, so Harry takes his dress suit and pawns it. With the proceeds he buys a bunch of flowers and takes them to Mabel's house. She is delighted and Harry is very self-satisfied until he learns that he cannot attend her party that evening unless he has a dress suit. Harry is visited by joy and gloom so often that the little fellows become quite friendly with him.

WEARY'S REVENGE (Nov. 3).—Frank Davis desires Amos Kearton as a son-in-law; but Davis's daughter, Lindy, loves Frank Reed. Lindy one day provokes Amos to such an extent that he vents his fury upon a poor farm lad. A tramp, seeing the whipping Amos is giving the boy, intercepts and is bested. A few days later, Amos visits Davis's home to pay him a mortgage due. Davis, in his hurry to get to town, drops his keys, which Amos picks up and extracts the money from the draw. In escaping he is brought face to face with the tramp, who takes from him his coat and hat, containing the stolen money.

During his rambles the tramp comes across three pies on the window sill of the Davis home. The cook sees him trying to steal them and lets out a yell that bring two farm hands, who chase the tramp. He manages, however, to elude his pursuers, and coming upon an old scarecrow, puts the coat he is wearing on it and takes the old ragged one.

Davis, who has discovered the loss of his keys, returns, only to find the draw open and the money gone. The blame is placed upon Frank, who happens to be visiting Lindy at the time. It looks pretty bad for Frank, until Lindy discovers Amos' coat on the scarecrow with the mortgage money in it. Mr. Davis goes at once to Amos' farm, where he hears a full confession of the theft. This removes all suspicion from Frank, and Davis gives his consent to their wedding.

AMERICAN.

ONE, TWO, THREE (Oct. 28).—How three out of four men betting that they would never marry fell victims to the darts of Cupid in the first skirmish. If it hadn't been a Western town with a scarcity of women the last man would have fallen and the bet called a draw. As it was he nursed a broken heart, and the wager serves only as a balm.

CHIQUITA, THE DANCER (Oct. 30).—A mining story in which a young Mexican girl plays a very important part frustrating the plans of several villainous claim jumpers. A crooked justice of the peace also takes a hand in the game, but only succeeds in landing himself into the hands of the U. S. Marshal. A realistic fire scene affords opportunity for Chiquita to distinguish herself and supplies the setting for a grand love tableau.

THE WANDERER (Oct. 31).—A ranchman is beset by a bully whose unwelcome attentions are resented by the ranchman's daughter. Everything seems to be in favor of the bully until the hero makes his appearance, when the tide changes and one defeat after another is the lot of the vicious bully until her is driven away in disgrace. In the sequel of this story we see the hero endeavoring to extricate himself from the meshes of a promising love affair, but the outcome is just as you expect it should be.

MAIDEN AND MEN (Nov. 4).—The mind of the child comes to us as a blank and upon it may be indelibly engraved the outline of a character for good or bad. It is incumbent upon us to guard our minds that no influences be brought to bear that might misshapen the character lines or tend to obliterate those so carefully drawn by the foresight of those whose duty it was to guard over us. Ofttimes we are misguided in our conduct because of improper sentiment, born from influences that tend to destruct rather than construct. The principles in this story illustrate this theme admirably.

THE STARBUCKS (2 reels) (Nov. 9).—A descriptive review of this two-reel subject is printed in another part of this issue, by Mr. James S. McQuade.

THE REDEMPTION OF RIVERTON (Nov. 1).—Riverton was the average wicked little town, given over to drunkenness, gossip and hypocrisy. Then the new minister, the Rev. John Gibson, arrives, and soon becomes aware of the condition of affairs. On the day of his arrival, he meets June Martin, and is told that she is the granddaughter of Billy Martin, the principal saloon-keeper of the town. The Rev. Gibson, having had an athletic training, proceeds to extreme measures to reform the village drunkards. On one occasion he carries home, bodily, from a saloon, the town drunkard.

Then the liquor clique, headed by the deacon in Gibson's church, start a counter movement against Gibson and endeavor to discredit him before the community, by making it appear that Gibson is a whiskey drinker himself. This is where June Martin comes to his rescue by proving Gibson's entire innocence before the church committee, and not satisfied with that she also makes public the fact that the deacon, who is Gibson's principal accuser, is the owner of her grandfather's saloon.

The end of Gibson's crusade shows the entire town converted to sobriety and true religion, with the exception of the wicked deacon who is left friendless and alone upon the doorstep of his saloon, which bears the sign "To Let" upon its front door. June and her husband, the Rev. Gibson, are the most popular people in the town.

"O, SUCH A NIGHT" (Nov. 3).—Pearl has an awful temper. So has her hubby. Hubby invites some friends to the house. They play poker, leaving Pearl to her own amusements. At 12:30 they are still at it, and Pearl in an outburst breaks up the game, just when Hubby is about to regain his losses. Hubby thinks to frighten Pearl out of her temper by writing that he will shoot himself. Pearl also writes a suicidal note, saying she will drown herself in the bathtub. Hubby goes out but returns only "half shot." Meanwhile the cook has taken a bath and Pearl is unable to carry out her threat. Hubby finds Pearl's note and rushes to the bath room, expecting to find Pearl's dead body. He opens the door very hurriedly and throws the cook into the tub, giving her another bath. The cook throws hubby into the tub, clothes and all. Pearl enters at this moment and they explain that their suicide notes were mere jests to cure each other's tempers.

MARRIAGE A LA CARTE (Nov. 3).—George Jones "touches" his Uncle Josh for a thousand dollar loan, explaining that he is engaged to be married. Uncle comes from Cohoes to meet the girl. George persuades his typist Nellie (who adores him) to pretend to be his intended. Uncle likes Nellie and insists that the young couple marry instantly. George arranges with his friend, Ned, to play a fake parson. Ned meets with a funny accident and uncle secures a real minister. George caught in his own trap and Nellie wins a husband.

SUE (Oct. 28).—Dave Bailey's wife dying, gives her child to the keeping of Sue Barksdale. A year later Sue is in love with Dave, the widower. He is about to declare his love for her when Virginia Dale, a young authoress, comes on the scene and he is at once smitten by her beauty. She, in turn, falls in love with him, and before long declares his love for her in Sue's presence.

The child, in wandering through the woods, is just about to pet a huge snake, when she is rescued by Virginia, who is bitten by the snake. Her screams are heard by Sue, who, in running to aid her, falls and cuts her lip. She sucks the snake bite, thus inoculating herself through the bleeding lip with the poison. Dave comes with a jug of whiskey. Virginia is saved and Sue dies a martyr to the love of Dave.

CAREFUL NURSING (Oct. 31).—Mr. Markham gets ill. A hospital nurse is brought to nurse him. He likes being nursed. His four sons all fall in love with the nurse. They all pretend to be sick and take to their beds. Mrs. Markham is distracted. The butler also falls in love with the nurse. The nurse's husband, a pugilist, from whom she has run away on account of his drinking habits, catches the butler kissing his wife's photograph outside the house. He is delighted to have located his wife at last and plots to win her back. He learns from the butler what is going on inside the house. He dresses up as a hospital nurse and applies for the position to assist his wife. Mrs. Markham is delighted at his ugly appearance and engages him. He tries drastic treatment on the patients and quickly cures them. The butler forces his unwelcome attentions on the wife. The pugilist thrashes the butler and earns his wife's gratitude and forgivenes.

AN OLD-FASHIONED MOTHER (Nov. 3).—Silas and Aunt Chloe reside in a fishing hamlet. They receive a letter from their son, inviting them to come and reside with them, announcing that he has been married several years. They make preparations for the journey and Aunt Chloe goes to the garret and takes from the rafters herbs that are hanging there which she uses for medical purposes, and packs them in her grip. Silas takes an affecting leave of his old fishing cronies, returns home, and the old couple go to the city. They are met by the son, who gives them a royal welcome, but their country airs and homespun clothes cannot be tolerated by his aristocratic wife. Arriving at the home of Charles, the old couple unpack their grips, and, among other things, Aunt Chloe produces the roots and herbs and explains they are for medical purposes, much to the anger of Louise. The young wife makes it unpleasant for the parents of her husband, much to their sorrow and the humiliation of Charles. Dorothy becomes seriously ill, and Aunt Chloe wishes to administer her home remedies, but Louise is disgusted and forbids it. The child grows worse and Aunt Chloe takes her roots and herbs to the kitchen, and prepares the medicine. She goes to the sick room and finds the nurse sleeping. Aunt Chloe has her medicine in a fruit jar and keeps vigil with the child and administers the medicine during the night, while the nurse sleeps. This is repeated the following night when the nurse is pleased to be relieved, and the next morning the child is much better and is discovered with her grandmother asleep. Charles comes in and notices the jar of medicine, awakens his mother, and she tells him she has cured his child by her humble medicine. They leave and the mother enters and discovers the jar, and the child tells her she has taken medicine out of the jar and is almost cured. In their room Silas and Aunt Chloe have decided they are not wanted by Louise, and they are packing their grips to return home. Louise enters, grateful that the life of her child has been saved by Aunt Chloe, and places her arms around the neck of her mother-in-law and bids them to stay on forever with her.

THE OLD DOLL MAKER (Oct. 24).—Claude Petreaux is an old doll maker, who lives with his daughter, Lucille. He has an apprentice, Villon, by name, a worthless man who loves Lucille. The young folks wish to marry, but Claude denies his permission. Villon persuades Lucille to elope. The old man is broken down with grief and swears that she will never darken his door again. Five years pass. In a distant city the young people are struggling to make a living. As a doll maker, Villon has not achieved success and he has already begun to descend the steep roads of dissipation. A little girl, four years, has been born to them. One day the little girl brings home a dog to the already half-starved household. Villon, in drunken anger, at having another mouth to feed, kicks the dog brutally, and would put him out of doors, but the little girl takes the dog in her arms and pleads that it may be kept. In this she receives the support of her mother. In rage he vows that he will never feed them and leaves them to shift for themselves.

The old man, in the meantime, feels that death is near, which increases his longing for Lucille, who paints a miniature of her baby and sends it to her father. He receives the miniature and calls in a notary. He disposes of his stock, and, using the miniature as a model, he fashions a doll and dispatches it to them.

The wolf of starvation has made its appearance to Lucille and her child. She is anxiously awaiting a return to her letter. The packet with the doll arrives. The little girl is delighted with it, but the mother is keenly disappointed that no tangible help has been vouchsafed, and gives way to despair. At this time Villon returns deeply repentant with promises of reformation which woman-like, she accepts. The father takes the doll away from his child and throws it out of the window. The dog runs after it and the little girl sobs for her new toy. The father scolds her and the mother tries in vain to give her comfort. In the meantime the dog has found the doll in the yard and proceeds to tear it apart. The child seeing this, sobs even more piteously than ever at the destruction of her plaything. The mother's heart relents and she bids Villon go and rescue it. He brings it in, in a mangled condition when to their surprise and delight they find the concealed money.

ECLAIR.

AUNT BRIDGET (Nov. 3).—The summer is very hot and Aunt Bridget would like to spend it in the country, but her nephew and niece, Joseph and Irene, have not invited her. But if Aunt Bridget is poor in money, she is rich in ideas. She will outwit them. Knowing the attorney, Ducarneau, she asks him to write her a letter as follows: You have inherited $50,000. Let me have your instructions." A dealer in cardboard money will deliver the inheritance in real money bags and it will be placed in the cupboard. The letter will remain on the table so that Joseph and Irene will not fail to see it.

The nephew and niece pay her a visit, but are very anxious to get back to the country, it is so hot in Paris. Of course, they do not fail to "bite at the bait," and insist that Aunt Bridget come with them. In the country she leads a very fine life, well taken care of by Joseph and Irene. In the autumn, she complains of the cold and wants to return to Paris, but they insist that she remain. They even go to Paris to get her warmer clothing. This journey had a purpose. They want to see the famous fortune which they hope will be theirs some day. While they are absent, Aunt Bridget reads in the paper that by a lottery ticket she has won $100,000. Aha, she will laugh heartily when Joseph and Irene return. But they are greatly surprised when they find that the money is "fake" and return to put Aunt Bridget out. They do it so quickly and make her take the first train for Paris in such haste, that she cannot find time to tell them the good news. It is only when the train has left that they find out their mistake. They regret very much that they have misunderstood so "precious" an aunt. But it is too late.

SILENT JIM (Nov. 5).—An extended review of this subject is published elsewhere in this number.

FOILING A FORTUNE HUNTER (Nov. 7).—Charles Highby discovers that his daughter is about to elope with a strange young man, who has been meeting her in secret. Highby has planned for her to wed Jack Spencer, the junior partner in his business, but instead of becoming immediately angry, he takes things in his usual calm way and sets about an investigation of the new lover, Count Frizelli. Finding him to be a criminal and a fortune hunter, Highby decides that the best way to cure his daughter of the infatuation would be to show her his desperate manner, and give her a glimpse of his true character at the same time. Taking Jack Spencer into his confidence, he arranges for him to take the chauffeur's place during the elopement. Spencer contrives to make DeForrest angry and he shows his true nature throughout most of the ride. The girl is to be brought to the altar by threatening her with a pistol. At the church Highby confronts them, the frightened girl falls into his arms seeking to be taken home. Frizelli tries to shoot but Spencer disarms him. The evidence against him is produced and the bogus count, thoroughly frightened, runs away.

WHAT DAD DID! (Nov. 7).—Father desires to smoke his pipe, but his daughters object, as they are expecting their sweethearts and don't wish to have the odor of the pipe in the room. Father makes room for his daughters' young men, but when the cook's sweetheart objects to his being in the kitchen that is the last straw and father goes on the war path and at the end is comfortably seated in the parlor, very contentedly smoking his pipe.

MILANO.

A TRAGIC WEDDING (Nov. 2).—Guy Firming is sent by his rich uncle to South America to look after his business interests there. Renata, the uncle's daughter, with whom Guy is in love, is to become his wife if he proves himself a worthy young business man. This is a secret between Guy and his uncle, and Renata, knowing nothing about it, places her affections in the keeping of Jules, a clerk.

Guy, having been successful in his business negotiations, returns home to become the husband of Renata, who, upon being told of her father's wishes, sobs out that she is in love with Jules. Her father is steadfast in his promises to Guy, and Renata reluctantly acquiesces with his wishes.

The wedding takes place, and in the confusion of the guests to congratulate the pair, Jules manages to slip a note into Renata's hands, telling her he

OUR PLATFORM

PLANK TWO—The moving picture theatre owners and managers realize that they have been grossly deceived in the past by unscrupulous agents who come from NOWHERE and REPRESENT NOTHING. These parties cannot guarantee, even if they so desire, anything they sell. Their only stock in trade is something just as good at a lesser price. By all means look out for them, for once your screen is paid for your chance to recover is decidedly small.

The American Theatre Curtain & Supply Co. will act as your personal supply house. Should any injury occur to screen after installing. We co-operate with purchaser to replace same as good as new with no additional expense to him. Isn't it worth something to buy from one who is responsible?

The RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN is made only by the American Theatre Curtain & Supply Co. at their factory in St. Louis, each and every screen being shipped direct from their own warehouse. We have adopted this policy to protect purchasers from deception on the part of unscrupulous salesmen who represent something, something "just as good." In the future look out for our trade-mark.

appreciates the sacrifice she is making and to destroy his letters.

In leaving the reception-room with her husband, Renata drops the note. It is picked up by Guy, who goes at once to his wife's desk and finds the letters referred to in the note. Although they are innocent epistles of love, they make Guy insane with jealousy. He determines to be avenged and an opportunity comes when he dismisses the chauffeur of the car in which he and his wife are riding. He takes the wheel and races the machine at full speed. He does not pay attention to his wife's appeals to stop, and he runs the car over a cliff, where they both meet death, Renata a victim to filial duty.

POWERS.

THE COLLABORATORS (Oct. 30).—Dick Lemon, a poet is writing his masterpiece, which he reads to Molly Dripping, the servant. Mrs. Beans, the landlady, comes in and orders Molly out, and asks the poet for the rent. He turns out his empty pockets but points hopefully to the poem. Mrs. Beans orders him to get out.

He proceeds to pack up. Molly remembers that he has had nothing to eat. She takes some food from the cupboard and takes it to him. He is overcome with gratitude and makes her a present of the poem. She returns to the kitchen where she comes across the rest of the paper she had wrapped the poet's food in. Her eyes happen to glance on an advertisement offering "$1,000 for four lines of poetry advertising Killem's Potted Meat." She reads it again, then takes out the poem given to her. She looks at it, gets an idea, cuts off the first verse, alters it, then hurriedly posts it.

In the meanwhile the poet is seen wandering on the railroad ties. Molly gets a letter from "The Killem Potted Meat Co.," sending her $1,000 for her poem, and offers her position as head of their advertising staff. She instantly throws up her situation and is installed in the offices of The Potted Meat Co., but alas she cannot write poetry, so she cuts off another verse of the poem and alters it, much to the delight of the manager. The poet is now seen near the city reading a newspaper when he is astounded to see his poem advertising "Potted Meat" and vowing vengeance, he proceeds straight to their offices. Here he finds Molly now in deep disgrace, because the manager wants more poetry and she can't think of any. The poet enters and indignantly asks for the manager. To his utter astonishment he meets Molly there, who explains things and to help her he gets behind the screen and when the manager returns again he gets all the poetry he wants.

A DREAMLAND TRAGEDY (Nov. 1).—A family quarrel and the sight of a large roll of money, the pay roll, so influences the mind of the laborer's daughter that she dreams of terrible things happening to her father, brother and sweetheart—the paymaster. In dreamland she sees her father drug her sweetheart's liquor and taking him home, proceeds to rob him of the pay roll. Coming upon them unawares, the girl manages to get the father out of the way, then summoning all her strength literally carries the young paymaster out of the house. In the meantime, her brother, a shiftless character, returns home and resolving to take things easy, falls asleep on the bed where the old man had placed the paymaster.

On returning from his errand, the father sees that the coast is clear, steals to the bed, still intent upon securing the pay roll and unaware of the fact that the figure on the bed is his own son instead of the intended victim. A struggle ensues in which the father chokes the son to insensibility and is discovered by the girl. At this juncture the men return from work and find the girl moaning in her sleep. With her awakening comes the realization that her terrible tragedy happened only in dreamland.

NESTOR.

THE CALL OF THE DESERT (Oct. 28).—Ben Crawford and his wife, Marion, live in a cabin near Ben's gold prospect. Marion longs for the city. The opportunity arrives when she receives a telegram telling her that her uncle has left her his fortune, provided she lives in his old home. They depart for the city. Bill is left behind in charge of the prospect, with instructions to keep Ben posted.

Marion plunges into the pleasures of society and indulges in a flirtation with Captain Everett, a society man. Ben gradually becomes conscious of the fact that the Captain is causing unnecessary gossip, and seeing him bending over Marion and talking in too affectionate manner to her, he asserts himself and orders the Captain to go. Ben goes back to his mine and his freedom.

Upon his arrival he finds that he possesses valuable property, but he grieves over the separation. Old Billy sees his listlessness and sends a telegram to Marion stating that Ben is seriously ill. Marion receives the telegram—it is the call she has been awaiting and she hurries to Ben. She arrives at the cabin and their old differences go into the land of forgetfulness as they hold each other tightly.

FATTY'S BIG MIX-UP (Oct. 30).—Pete, the cook, is thrown out of the cook-house. The boys declare that they will quit, but are pacified when the foreman writes an agency to send them a good female cook. The foreman goes to the station but no cook. In despair he hurries to a nearby ranch, but the ranchman will not part with Mandy, his female cook. He, however, offers Fatty, the assistant cook. The foreman must have a woman. Then Mandy gets the idea of dressing Fatty up in her clothes. After tipping him liberally Fatty agrees, he and the foreman arrive at the ranch and are agreeably received by the boys until Brown decides that he will go in and kiss the cook. He is kicked out, so the foreman, to show how he stands with the cook, starts for the door, his back is turned to the door, so Fatty helps him out with his boot. The boys, however, see his trousers under the female dress and drag him out and send him down the road in haste. In the meanwhile the real cook arrives, and gives the boys such an excellent dinner that they are in fine spirits. As soon as night falls Fatty returns for his clothes. He enters his former room, but hears someone coming, hides under the bed. The cook enters, sees the bed move, calls for help. The boys enter, drag Fatty out, and about to help him from the place more strenuously than before, when the foreman arrives and confesses.

MAKING A MAN OF HER (Nov. 1).—The "Bar B" ranch is up against it good and hard. Three cooks in succession have left and each cook has taken a susceptible cowboy home with her. The ranchman puts down his foot, saying no more women cooks for "Bar B." Emily is young and sweet and awfully hard up. She applies but is informed that her sex is against her. Passing a second-hand store she resolves that a little thing like that shall not interfere, so she buys a perfectly charming cowboy outfit, returns to the agency and gets the job. The boss is so pleased that he insists upon Emily joining him with one of his best and blackest cigars. She does so and experiences the worst symptoms of sea-sickness.

The rancher's daughter and her chum come to the ranch and all the boys fall in love with them. The girls fall in love with that "pretty boy cook," and when they insist upon visiting the kitchen with the untruthful assertion that they want to make candy, the boys look black and when they take a peep through the kitchen door and sees the cook in the arms of the two girls their wrath breaks loose. They do not know that she has cut her finger and that the sight of blood has caused her to faint, or that the girls have sought to give her air and that it has been necessary for Emily to confess to the girls.

Emily runs the gauntlet and is finally forced to don the boxing gloves. The boys are astonished when the cook weeps on the daughter's shoulder when she receives a tap on the nose. When she takes her cap off and her hair falls down, she gives them a brief but sufficient idea of how she regards them. Jim with a horror for boy-baiting has held aloof, and he and Emily keep up the old ranch traditions and get married.

BISON.

THE COWBOY GUARDIANS (Oct. 29).—A pioneer caravan is attacked by Indians, who greatly outnumber the pale faces. The whole party are massacred, with the exception of a year-and-one-half-old baby, who being hidden by its mother, escapes detection. Whitey is a big, bashful cowpuncher, who secretly worships at the shrine of the only eligible woman in camp, a buxom widow. She, in her turn, has made up her mind to overcome Whitey's bashfulness.

Whitey is among the cowboys who find the baby. They take it back to camp and resolve to adopt it. The experiment is not altogether successful, for all the boys want to monopolize the babe's attention. They draw lots as to who shall be the child's father and Whitey wins.

So far so good, but the other boys come to the conclusion that the baby should have a mother, and they bring the widow and Whitey together and congratulate themselves upon a marvelous stroke of diplomacy. The marriage takes place and all is merry as a marriage bell, when the smiling babe is placed in Mrs. Whitey's arms. She is interested and asks whose it is. The cowboys tactfully tell her it is Whitey's and therefore hers. Three hundred and thirty pounds of grief-stricken and horrified avoirdupois falls in a faint, which turns a joy when the situation is properly explained.

TRAPPER BILL, KING OF SCOUTS (Nov. 2).—Trapper Bill, a scout, gets into a quarrel with a drunken trader named Shunan, and worsts him in a fight. Shunan covets Silver Heels, an Indian maid, and the Chief barters her for presents. Shunan carries her off in triumph. She slips from his horse and runs into the woods. Shunan follows her and catches up with her near the edge of a cliff. She wounds him with her knife, but is disarmed and is about to be thrown over the cliff when Trapper Bill appears and forces Shunan over the cliff. He saves himself on the way down, and refusing help limps away. Bill takes Silver Heels to the Mission Church where they are married.

Shunan drinks heavily and forces another fight upon Trapper Bill and is wounded in the shoulder by Silver Heels. Shunan thereupon rides to the Indian camp and joins the tribe. He persuades the Indians to raid the white man's corral and steal a number of their horses. The trappers hunt the Indians down, put them to rout and burn their tepees as a lesson. Shunan escapes.

Some years pass and Silver Heels is called to the Happy Hunting Grounds leaving Bill to mourn her loss. The Mexicans are getting unbearable and a menace. Trapper Bill joins a regiment of trappers and scouts, and their services are gladly accepted by General Kearney at headquarters.

Shunan offers his services as a spy to the Mexicans and is cheerfully received. Shunan gets useful information and leads an attack upon the American camp. They are besieged and suffer from the want of water and food. Trapper Bill offers to ride for relief and reinforcements. He successfully negotiates the Mexican lines and reaches the main camp in an exhausted condition. The reinforcements reach the hard pressed American camp just in time to save it from being annihilated; the Mexicans are chased and many killed and captured. The prisoners are set free and Bill finds ultimate happiness and peace with one of the released girls.

MABEL'S LOVERS (Nov. 4).—Mabel has many admirers, and when she arrives at the summer resort she receives a number of proposals of marriage. Unable to decide, she determines to put the men to a test, so, before going bathing she fills her stockings with ugly bumps. When she discards her coat her unsightly limbs cause the men to beat a hasty retreat, with the exception of Black, who peeped when she made herself up. The next day when Mabel appears minus her ugly protuberances, Black is the envied of all, while the men who deserted her try to get into her good graces again, but without success.

AT IT AGAIN (Nov. 4).—Mrs. Smith receives an anonymous letter stating that her husband is untrue to her, and she calls upon the detectives to shadow him. Smith comes home and, finding his wife away, goes out to look for her, in his shirt sleeves. Mrs. Smith points him out to the detectives, and they start on his trail.

In the meantime Larkins, a police captain, is at home with his wife, and goes out to buy some ice cream, also in his shirt sleeves. As Smith enters a house Larkin comes out, just as the detectives turn the corner, and they, thinking Larkin is Smith, follow him. When Larkin returns home his fond wife makes much of him, all of which is noted by the detectives at the window. They finally decide to arrest him, and a furious scene is raised by the indignant Larkin and his wife, but to no avail, for Larkin is dragged off. In the meantime they have notified Mrs. Smith and she is on the way to meet them with three policemen, and Smith himself comes up at the same time. When Larkin and Smith get through with the detectives they have learned the painful lesson that it does not pay for a detective to make a mistake.

BRONCHO

THE MAN THEY SCORNED (2 reels—Nov. 6).—Stein enlisted in the army. As a raw recruit he was made the victim of rude pranks. The only ray of sunshine in his life was the sympathy of little Dollie, the Colonel's daughter, whose childish heart was touched by the abuse of the man. One day he turned upon his tormentors and surprised all by the fury of his attack. Though fighting a score of men, he held his own until the Colonel, hearing the fracas, rushed onto the scene. Everybody accused Stein of being the aggressor, and he was sent to the guardhouse.

His imprisonment was ended by an outbreak of Indians, who in tremendous numbers were attacking the emigrants and settlers. The soldiers went gallantly to the fray, but were overwhelmed by the Indians, and were compelled to retreat. The Colonel's horse was shot down and he was pinned underneath the animal when Stein came thundering by. With a jerk of the reins that threw his horse back on its haunches he wheeled around, and came to the Colonel, whom he pulled up and mounted on his horse, and leaping behind him tried to escape. But the load was too heavy for the animal, and the Indians drew closer and closer. Only one man could escape on the horse, and Stein begged his Colonel to go on alone. Coming to a rocky hill Stein leaped off the horse and crawled to the top, while the Colonel, giving Stein his pistols, galloped on.

Entrenched behind the rocks, Stein fought like a lion. The narrow pass made it impossible for the Indians to rush him and he held his own, picking off the leaders. The bullets are seen striking about him, and finally he is struck. Again and again the bullets hit him, and he is in a dying condition when the soldiers, reinforced by additional troops, charge the redskins and defeat them.

Unconscious, Stein is carried back to the fort and to the Colonel's quarters. Doctors and nurses fight with death for his life, and finally turn the tide in their favor, and Stein is slowly brought out of danger. The Colonel had recommended his promotion for bravery, and the official commission as sergeant is received.

Gundlach Projection Lenses Guarantee You the Sharpest and Most Brilliant Picture it is Possible to Produce.

If you want to improve your picture just order a lens for trial subject to approval and see the result with your own eyes. If you give the height and width of the screen, the size of the picture wanted and the distance from the machine to the centre of the screen we can furnish a lens of the exact focus for your operating conditions.

Many Exhibitors have found it an advantage to ask our advice about lenses before equipping new Theatres. Do not be afraid of a long throw. No matter what the distance is to the screen we can supply lenses of suitable focus and great illuminating power. All the best theatres in Rochester use our lenses and every customer has been satisfied of their superiority to ordinary lenses. THE LENS MAKES THE PICTURE, and you cannot get the best result out of the film unless you use Gundlach Lenses.

You can order through any Film Exchange or Dealer in Motion Picture Supplies.

Gundlach Projection Lenses will be furnished to order with the following machines subject to a little higher price than ordinary lenses: Powers Cameragraph, The Motiograph, The Simplex, The American Standard, The Edison. Our Lenses are used by the Kinemacolor Co. and a large number of the finest theatres in the United States and Canada.

GUNDLACH-MANHATTAN OPTICAL CO., 808 Clinton Ave. So., Rochester, N. Y.

TO KEEP THE CROWDS COMING

there is no better way than to have a well ventilated theater. The up-to-date moving picture theaters have recognized the importance of good ventilation by installing

WATSON VENTILATING FANS.

The Watson Motors used to drive these fans are among the best designed motors for direct drive on the market.

COST LITTLE TO OPERATE.

An 18-inch fan moving 3,400 cu. ft. a minute costs less than 1c an hour with current at 6c a kilowatt-hour. A 24-inch fan costs less than 2c, and a 30-inch (extensively used), only a trifle more than 2c an hour.

IMMEDIATE DELIVERY.

If you are looking for a steady attendance all year round, keep the air fresh and remove the odorous and used air by getting a Watson Ventilating Fan, Now. Don't spoil your theater by allowing it to get stuffy and "smelly."

Mail the coupon and get our Fan booklet. We will tell you what some theater owners have to say about Watson Ventilating Fans.

3 in One

Because he has tried all the Moving Picture machine oils and knows that 3 in One is the best and most economical. It lubricates perfectly star wheel, fly wheel, shutter and every other part of the entire mechanism.

3 in One cleans and polishes like new, theater seats, piano, music racks, electric fans and scores of other things "in front" and also back of the curtain. Absolutely prevents rust on all metal surfaces. Try it indoors and then outdoors, too—on your metal signs, black iron lamps and ornaments, hinges, etc.

Get Your Free Bottle Today

Send right this minute for a generous free sample and the free 3 in One Dictionary. Then, give this good oil the hardest test. After you're satisfied, after the test has convinced you, remember you can buy a half-pint for a half-dollar (M. P. machine size) and save money. 10c, 25c, 50c, everywhere.

EVER HOPING FOR JIM SHE REFUSES TO MARRY PAUL

The Smuggler's Prisoner

Their boat upsets at sea, Mary drifts ashore with the aid of oars while Jim is picked up by a smuggler's vessel and forced to become a smuggler and lead their vile, lawless life. Many times he attempts to escape, but is thwarted. Five years elapse. All believe him dead. Paul, Jim's former partner, asks Mary's hand in marriage, but is refused because she prefers to wait and hope. She loved Jim too well, but not in vain, for he at last effects his escape and the happy family is reunited because of Mary's love and FAITH.

INSIDE INFORMATION

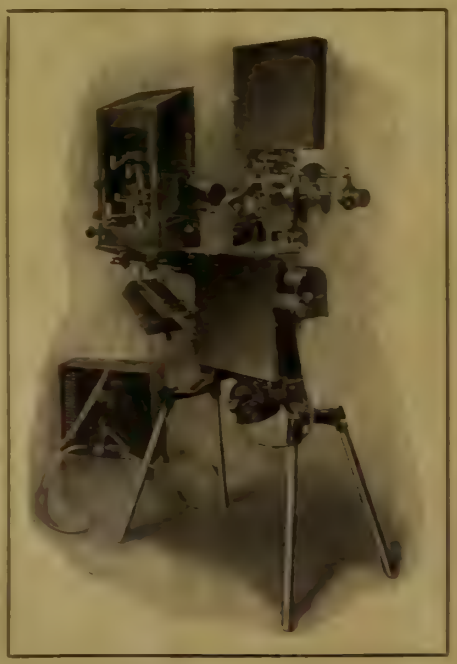
NOT Always BEST. The Parts of

POWER'S 6A

Mechanism Are on the OUTSIDE.

THE OPERATOR is the man who has to contend with and "stand for" the machine. He knows that, if for any reason the house goes dark, and he has to flash on the screen. "One Moment, Please," he must be able to locate his difficulty quickly. If the parts are enclosed, that means delay and an impatient audience.

On a POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6A the parts ARE ALL EXPOSED; they may be seen and got at instantly.



That is one of the many reasons which give to POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6A the supremacy over all other moving picture machines.

FIVE-A-WEEK ESSANAY

THE WEEK'S GREATEST DRAMATIC FEATURE!

"CHAINS"

Released Tuesday, Nov. 5th.

"CHAINS"

Miss Ruth Stonehouse, Francis X. Bushman and Bryant Washburn in one of the greatest, most powerful and tense dramatic studies ever offered by Essanay. Woven, link by link, into a superb masterpiece of film-craft!

Released Wednesday, Nov. 6th.

"A MONEY ?"

A snappy, jovial and altogether delicious comedy, involving complications that captivate with mirth and ringing laughter. Something doing every moment, and replete with corking good surprises. John Steppling, Billy Mason and E. H. Calvert in funny roles.

Released Thursday, Nov. 7th.

"THE RANCHMAN'S ANNIVERSARY"

A laughable Western comedy-drama, serious in its moments of "near"-tragedy, and bubbling over with funniest fun throughout. The inauguration of Essanay's TWO GREAT WESTERN SUBJECTS EACH WEEK.

Released Friday, November 8th.

"WHEN WEALTH TORMENTS"

Francis X. Bushman, Mildred Weston and Helen Dunbar in one of the best comedies for the month. Poor Mrs. Mahoney has the time of her life getting her daughter, Maggie, married to a foreign title—and doesn't land it at that. But she does win the man of her choice, and therein lies a charming plot.

Released Saturday, Nov. 9th.

"AN INDIAN'S FRIENDSHIP"

Mr. G. M. Anderson featured in his world-famous role of "BRONCHO BILLY." A strong, vigorous tale of days in the old West; of false suspicions, thrilling situations and a desperate ride to save an innocent man from the most degrading of deaths. A powerful feature!

REEL REASON FILM FACTS

For the Careful Investor

Incontestably it has been proved that State Rights business is highly profitable to the purchaser. For the man already in the film business or to he who seeks lucrative investment there are few superior propositions—when he chooses the right product. The investor in THE VENGEANCE OF EGYPT has for assurance these affirmatives—the sterling name of Gaumont, and their sane principles, their logical viewpoint.

Uniformly above mere praise are the regular Gaumont releases. Beyond witchery of words is the result when in the instance of State Rights business, special effort is made. The Gaumont Company, realizing the colossal possibilities of feature film operations, feel keenly the necessity of producing a product commensurate with the extraordinary requirements — that there must be no variation in grade and that that grade must be premier. And upon the Gaumont principle that the interests of producer and exhibitor must be identical, is THE VENGEANCE OF EGYPT offered.

A Story Having the Potency of Poe

The theme is that of an Egyptian Princess, dead 2000 years, whose spirit is outraged by the stealing of a ring from the mummy's finger. A revenge insatiable, leaving a wake of woe extending a century's length. An atmosphere weird and interest compelling. A background of Oriental occultism wreaking the wrath of a wraith through human passions.

NOTHING CAN STOP THAT UNIVERSAL LANDSLIDE NOW!

Exhibitors in all parts of the country who formerly sniffed at the mere mention of "Independent" films are now demanding that Universal program with all their might and main. As soon as we proved our strength and showed the world that we meant business, they began to flock toward Universal. We'll win YOU yet.

HAVE YOU SEEN OUR LATEST PRODUCTIONS?

Have you noticed the astonishing improvement in Universal quality? Have you investigated to see if we are making good the promises we published a few weeks ago? Will you take the very first opportunity to see a Universal program and prove for yourself that it is the strongest, the cleanest, the most uniform, the best balanced, and in every way the best film program you can possibly use?

OUR FEATURES COST YOU NOT A PENNY EXTRA!

We are jamming our program full of magnificent features every week—every one of them strong enough to overcome the biggest "state-right" features that you have been competing with. You get these without extra charge, but they'll make you a mint of extra money. Wake up, man! Be alive! Find out what is going on! Keep posted on your business! It's time for you to [redacted]

IMP

" A STRANGE CASE."
Monday, November 4th.

A capital drama in which King Baggot leads us through a series of adventures in the "under-world." A detective problem play.

"LEAH, THE FORSAKEN"—Three Reels.
Thursday, November 7th.

A PULSATING LIVING INTERPRETATION OF A MASTERPIECE. A THREE REEL DE LUXE PRODUCTION STAGED AND ACTED WITH A SUBLIMITY THAT SURPASSES ANY PICTURE EVER MADE. A REAL SHOW IN THREE REELS.

"HALF A SHOT"—On the Same Reel, "HOW NED GOT THE RAISE."
Saturday, November 9th.

The kind of a split comedy that makes 'em wear a smile that won't come off. Positive spasms of laughter.

VICTOR

"SISTERS."
Friday, November 8th.

If Mary's husband hadn't been a cad and Annie's husband a brave fire laddie Annie would never have been accused of being untrue. That she never knew he suspected her was a blessing. A particularly fine Florence Lawrence dramatic release.

Peeps Into The Future

Feature Releases Part of Regular Program!

IT'S HERE! IT'S HERE! IT'S HERE!

"THE SHIP OF LIONS" (Ambrosio)—One Reel Feature. Released November 6th. Fifteen ferocious lions roaming the deck of a burning ship. A crackerjack animal picture. S. R. O. attraction.

"THE TRIBAL LAW" ("101"-Bison)—Two Reels. Something novel; something new in an Indian picture. Released November 16th.

"THE DEBT" (Rex)—Two Reel Feature. A drama that will bring 'em back a second time. Released November 21st.——Don't miss a single Ambrosio; they are all money makers.

NESTOR

"UNITED WE STAND."
Monday, November 4th.

A dramatic rehearsal of the memories of a soldier of the South and a hero of the North. Produced with military zeal and realism.

"HIS LITTLE PARTNER."
Wednesday, November 6th.

The mad ride of little Tess to register Dick's claim, after he had been wounded, is only one of the many thrills of this exciting Westerner.

"SHARPS AND CHAPS."
Friday, November 8th.

When Mme. Dulce and her husband fleeced the unsuspecting cow punchers they were mighty glad the girls took them back to their hearts. Highly amusing.

REX

"THE HONOR OF THE FAMILY."
Thursday, November 7th.

Gerald's love for Marja, the mountain girl, was pure and true; but his brother's suaveness infatuated her. The developments following the secret marriage are as rapid as they are invigorating and exciting.

"A GALLEY SLAVE'S ROMANCE."
Sunday, November 10th.

Joan loved Annette. The Signeur desired her. The latter wouldn't desist from his undesired attentions, so Joan threw him over the cliff. Joan's prison life and the years that followed are highly emotional.

CHAMPION

"A TRAMP'S STRATEGY."

How a Knight of the Road entered into a conspiracy to fool an irate parent and how the highly humorous practical joke brought about the mating of two loving souls.

MILANO

"HER MASTERPIECE."
Saturday, November 9th.

"Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned." The manner in which Sonia interpreted his proverb is highly dramatic. A picture with a "punch" in every scene.

POWERS

"THE RAILROAD AND THE WIDOW."
Wednesday, November 6th.

When Bracken insisted upon confiscating her property the widow shot him. It was the clever ruse her daughter used that saved her from prison.

"THE FIRST GLASS."
Friday, November 8th.

A picture with a moral that will strike a sympathetic chord in the hearts of young and old alike. Highly dramatic; intensely emotional.

101 BISON

"A RED MAN'S LOVE."
Tuesday, November 5th.

Two thousand feet of excitement crowded into one reel which seethes with thrilling situations. Plenty of people and action.

"AN INDIAN ISHMAEL."
Saturday, November 9th.

A totally different sort of Indian-Military picture. Produced with a fervor and magnetism that will make 'em shout in admiration.

GEM

"THE BETTER PART."
Tuesday, November 5th.

'Twas a choice between total blindness and her sweetheart's life. Miriam's noble sacrifice will make a tremendous impression.

CRYSTAL

"THE GYPSY FLIRT AND MAN WANTED."
Sunday, November 10th.

Two comedies with entirely new style of humorous situations. The kind of laughter getters that will give m a pain in their sides.

HAT ANIMATED WEEKLY

ECLAIR

"SILENT JIM"—Two Reels.
Tuesday, November 5th.

A story of a man's hate and gratitude with many exciting periods in his life's career. Most dramatically staged and acted amid the wild beauty of Northwest Canada.

"FOILING A FORTUNE HUNTER AND WHAT FATHER DID."
Thursday, November 7th.

A serio-comedy with plenty of laughs joined to a side-splitting farce. A continuous series of laughs from start to finish.

"GOLDEN HAIR—CONSTANTINOPLE."
Sunday, November 10th.

A girl's willingness to sacrifice her golden tresses that she might procure a dowry forms a pretty theme for a very fine dramatic offering; along with it views of the city where the Balkan War operations are centered.

AMBROSIO

"THE SHIP OF LIONS"—One Reel Feature.
Wednesday, November 6th.

Fifteen ferocious lions roam the deck as the ship burns. No animal picture with more thrilling situations. The greatest feature ever included on a regular program. A positive sure-fire hit.

THE SUBSTITUTE HEIRESS

James Stillman, a young millionaire, is invited to his broker's home for a visit and to be entertained by his daughter Emily. She, however, is just going on an auto tour and she dresses her pretty maid, Ruth, up and instructs her to play hostess. Stillman and Ruth fall in love and after the visit the young man receives an invitation to Emily's wedding. Sorrowfully he attends only to find that the bride is not the girl he loves. Explanations follow and he rushes back to claim the pretty maid.

Released Thursday, Nov. 7th, 1912. Length 1067 ft.

THE SHERIFF'S MISTAKE

Nellie Bassett, a ranchman's daughter, learns that a reward of $1,000.00 is offered for the capture of an outlaw. A mortgage on the ranch is about to be foreclosed and the girl with her father start out to try and capture the man. Unfortunately they make a mistake and capture a U. S. Secret Service Agent who has lost his credentials. The girl goes back over the trail and finds the papers, also the cave of the real bandit, and gets the $1,000.00 reward. The Secret Service man is released, and he in turn makes the ranchman's daughter a prisoner for life.

Released Mon., Nov. 11th, 1912. Length about 1,000 ft.

THE WAY OF THE MOUNTAINS

Don Allen and Bob Taylor love Mary Beall, a lass of the hills. Bob is favored by Mary and her little brother Tommy. A fight takes place in which Bob gets the best of it. Later Don shoots at Bob, but missing his mark kills Mary's little brother. Bob tracks the assassin and in a terrible fight gets wounded. Mary, however, rescues her lover and Don is turned over to the Law of the Mountains.

Released Friday, Nov. 8th, 1912. Length 378 feet.

FELIX AT THE BALL

Felix is a quiet stay-at-home man, but his wife is a social cyclone. She is invited to a ball and insists that Felix go with her. He has no dress suit, so she hires one which is several sizes too small. In the ball-room the lower part of the suit splits, he is chased out of the ball-room and through the street. Arriving home he meets his wife with a baseball bat and has to sleep in the back yard with the dog.

Released Friday, Nov. 8th, 1912. Length 670 feet.

An Accidental Millionaire

Mike Duggan receives information that his brother, Dan, has died in South Africa, and that he is heir to a Million. Mike's wife and daughters immediately begin to put on airs, but are terribly called down when the news comes that the information was a mistake.

Released Saturday, Nov. 9th, 1912. Length 1054 ft.

THE WATER RATS

Bill Graw, leader of a gang of thieves, tries to steal a locket belonging to Elsie Dane, daughter of the Tug owner. The girl defends the boy and he cherishes a dog-like devotion for her. Tom Williams, a police officer, is Elsie's sweetheart, and he has determined to break up the gang. In a desperate fight Bill gets the upperhand of the officer and chokes him insensible. He then discovers that Williams is wearing Elsie's locket, and it dawns on the water rat that they are lovers. He places the handcuffs upon his own wrists and gives himself up to the law.

Facts and Comments

EVERY one who is familiar with the progress and development of the motion picture in this country knows that the industry owes a considerable debt to the smaller exhibitors, the men and women who conduct electric theaters in the smaller communities. As a class these exhibitors are thoroughly in earnest and are in love with their calling. They guard the reputation of the picture with creditable jealousy, and are ready and capable of repelling the assaults and aspersions of the enemy. They are agitators in the best sense of the word. As a rule these exhibitors get little or no credit for their voluntary and often unselfish work, and when on a rare occasion one of them lets the world know what he is doing he is surely entitled to respectful attention. We have received a letter from an exhibitor in Richmond, Texas, which well deserves special mention in these columns. The letter relates to the vexed problem of Sunday opening and the habitually hostile attitude of the clergy. When the exhibitor started in to open on Sundays he at once became the target of denunciations from the various pulpits in his town. How did he meet these attacks? We let him speak for himself.

Speaking of the most virulent of these preachers the exhibitor says: "Of course I had to educate him. I therefore ordered every copy of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD from January 6th up to the present, and gathered together all the articles I could find on the subject of religious and educational subjects. Then I picked out the materials for the purpose of educating the preacher in the matter of moving pictures." The result of it all was that the Sunday exhibition became an accomplished fact in Richmond, and to-day the citizens of that town, including the ministers, are glad that the Sunday program has come and come to stay. Our friend and correspondent concludes his letter with the hope that "other exhibitors will be benefited by his experience." There is no doubt that they will be benefited if they go about it in the right way. The question of Sunday opening, more than ever before in the history of the world of amusements, is to-day a simple question of public sentiment. If the exhibitor knows how to influence and create sentiment in his favor the letter of the law will not stand in the way. The exhibitor must of course do his share by recognizing as far as possible the character of the day in the composition of his Sunday programs.

THE social uses of the motion picture are emphasized once more by the action of the Russell Sage Foundation, which has just organized a Department of Surveys and Exhibits. This department was established because twenty-six national organizations of welfare workers asked the Russell Sage Foundation to start an agency for helping them in the gathering of exact facts and then explaining these facts so that the citizens of the respective cities would carry out the ideas suggested by the facts. The cinematograph is to be used as an illustrator and teacher of facts. The directors of the Department of Surveys and Exhibits recognize the fact that motion pictures offer a means of interesting people in the facts about city life. Lectures are to be used in connection with this work of illustrating the purposes of the department. A practical beginning in the use of the motion picture as an agent for social betterment was made at a recent convention of Mayors and other city officials which was held at Walla Walla, in the State of Washington. The convention was held under the direction of the newly organized League of Pacific Northwest Municipalities. Through the efforts of a professor in the famous Whitman college a large number of health and civic films were secured and exhibited.

TO the growing number of foreign manufacturers who seek to get the benefits of the American market, a little word of advice may not be amiss at this time. It is natural that the European producer is attracted by the higher profits of the American market; it is natural, too, that in the making of his films he is more and more influenced by his consideration of the possibilities of a sale in the United States. When it comes, however, to the greater expense of marketing a production in this country, the European producer often suffers from a lack of perception. He is willing to take the higher profits, but not so willing to spend as much money as the domestic manufacturer must spend in order to get his films into the market. Until the European producer thoroughly realizes this fact and acts up to it in practice he will never amount to very much here in the matter of an occasional feature film.

A NEW YORK newspaper asserts that the bail of the maniac who shot at Colonel Roosevelt in Milwaukee was raised from $7,500 to $15,000 because it had "occurred to certain manufacturers of moving picture films that there is enough of morbid curiosity among their patrons to make it well worth while to photograph this unfortunate victim of a tainted heredity and to show him to gaping thousands on the screens in the cheap theaters." We have heard nothing of any such scheme, which the Board of Censorship could, of course, be relied on to nip in the bud. Besides, we do not believe that it would be profitable. Whatever public curiosity may exist to see a picture of the assassin has been more than gratified by the yellow newspapers. They have printed enough pictures of the poor wretch in all kinds of poses to satisfy the most morbid craving for the sensational and the disgusting.

SOMEWHERE recently we read of a plucky man in England who has a theatre all to himself, where he puts on such of his plays as have been returned with thanks by cruel and ignorant managers. This is said to have been going on for six and forty years, and the aged gentleman is still in the ring. The frosts of nearly half a century may have silvered his hair, but they have in no wise daunted his spirit. What a noble example of perseverance this brave old dramatist sets to our own ambitious and impulsive scenario writers, who would fain storm the citadel of success in a few fleeting years with a trifle of two or three hundred manuscripts.

Feature Programs

By W. Stephen Bush

IT is hard to believe that the public, having sat down to the cinematographic table d'hote, will rise from their chairs perfectly contented with having tasted the relishes and perused the rest of the bill of fare. Eating only stimulates the appetite, especially in the early stages of the meal. The friends and patrons of the motion picture want the full course, and they are especially anxious to taste the "piece de resistance." Now, the "piece de resistance," the really good thing of the table, is undoubtedly the feature reel. The feature film will become the parent of the feature theater. If there were in sight a steady and dependable supply of genuine features, consisting of not less than two nor more than five reels, the feature theater would be with us even now. I am far from saying that such a theater would in the least interfere with the ordinary electric theater, which offers only an occasional feature and relies on the regular releases for the steady offering to the patrons. I do believe, however, that a theater exclusively devoted to the exhibition of genuine and meritorious feature films, with special attention to music and an attendant lecturer, would draw capacity most of the time, and could command prices ranging from a minimum of fifteen up to fifty cents and higher.

Such theaters will not be possible, however, until the making of feature films is reduced to a system and a science. There must be a number of conditions complied with before this can be done. Under the present method releases of feature films are irregular; but this is not the greatest trouble. The serious trouble lies in the indiscriminate use of the word feature film. The only correct definition of a feature film must lay the stress on superior quality. Two, three, four, or even five and six reels of ordinary moving pictures do not make a feature, though these reels may all deal with the same subject. In other words, while the length of the film is essential, quality is even more essential. The feature film must deal with a suitable subject: there must be something striking and extraordinary about the theme. It need not be historic or classic in character, but it must impress the average mind as being a "different sort of picture." This superiority must manifest itself in other ways as well. The feature film which has the stamp of the "factory grind" and reminds us too much of the studios, with which most of the patrons of electric theaters are quite familiar, is a feature in name only, and no amount of advertising will change that fact. In the matter of scenarios, in the direction, in the selection of scenery, in the preparation of big spectacles, in the choice of artists, from the leading player down to the super, the feature film must bear distinct characteristics of its own which at once differentiate it from an ordinary release. It goes without saying that the making of a true feature film costs a good deal of money, and requires far more time in its preparation than the ordinary picture. Unless the exhibitor is able to charge a higher price for a feature exhibition he cannot pay for the increased cost in the producing of the picture. The present arrangements for the renting of extra feature releases are scarcely satisfactory. Few exhibitors feel justified in charging a higher price for just one evening, for the nearest competitor will draw away quite a large number of patrons who welcome the feature film. but prefer to regard it merely as an occasional variation of the program for which no extra charge ought to be made. Where a theater devotes itself entirely to features it is naturally a different thing, and the higher price follows as a matter of course, and the public accept it as a matter of course.

If we had a few circuits of feature houses creating a large enough demand for features of true merit, the true features would not be long in coming, and the supply would be ample. The exhibitor will be able to pay the higher rental, and the manufacturer will be in a position to do his best and spare no expense. The making and renting of feature films would become a distinct and separate branch of the industry. It is impossible to produce a true feature film in a week or in two weeks or in a month. Even where the plant and the equipment are such as to be specially adapted for the production of feature films, a good deal more time must be devoted to the feature than to the ordinary release. Four, five or, when the facilities of a manufacturer are particularly good, six feature reels a year will constitute the possible output of any one manufacturer. There are a few manufacturers now who run a separate feature department, but even they have no regular schedule of releases. System and certainty of supply are the absolute necessities of the feature film business of the future.

It is hardly necessary to add that the exhibition of real feature films would be impossible on a basis of daily changes. A feature film of genuine merit is enough like a big theatrical production to be treated as such. Some of the few really big and fine feature films which were put on the market last year had runs of two, three and four weeks, and even longer. Under the present system the exhibitor is often forced to be satisfied with one day's showing of a big feature, which would bring him three and four times the profits if he could hold it for three days or a week. He too often is compelled to pay extra rentals and give his patrons an expensive program enriched with a big feature without deriving any financial benefit for himself. He is quite willing to do this a few times a year by way of increasing the prestige of his place. He may charge the additional cost on such occasions to his advertising account. No exhibitor, however, can be expected to make a practice of this generosity with his own money.

A NEW CRITICISM.

AT a ministerial conference in Washington this week, while considering the all-around question of amusements, acting and actors, the question of moving pictures, of course, came up for consideration. In the first place it is worth while recording that the wholesale denunciation of the picture is a thing of the past.

Much of the criticism now is legitimate and is made in the interest of better pictures, and for the good of the people. The new criticism made upon this occasion is against "too much death" in so many pictures, battles with death scenes, murders, and too frequent illustrations of sudden death are spoken against.

It is perfectly natural to realize the morbidity caused by these scenes, to which too often some gruesomeness is added.

Life with all its brightness cannot be made too attractive, especially for children. On the whole, the criticism is wise in that it draws attention to this fact that we are unfortunately living in times when life is too easily forfeited, or taken. When life is cheap morals are low, when killing is rampant lesser crimes flourish. Make life more valuable, emphasize its sacredness, and a higher tone of civilization is a natural result. In the interest of young people the suggestion that life should be represented in more of its brightness, with all its possible value and usefulness, may afford many timely suggestions for scenario writers, whose taste and efforts will meet with appreciation.

Battle scenes as such do not concentrate the morbid sight of one conspicuous death, as in murder, suicide or sudden death from seemingly natural causes; as in all these instances guilt, grief and sorrow are so pictured as to arouse the emotions in various and often too unpleasant moods. Life: free, full, active, bright, always pleases at the time and remains sweet in the memory. Death is never welcome.

"The Kerry Gow" (Kalem) Three Reels

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

IT is well-known that the Irish spirit and the Irish humor are irresistibly contagious. Thackeray relates how even the great Napoleon, on the memorable occasion of Major Gahagan's visit to the court, moved his conquering feet to the tune of a jig and how a merely formal court ceremony was through the Major's bubbling jollity changed into "a great day for Saint Patrick and Ould Ireland." Kalem's version of "The Kerry Gow" would have delighted the heart of Major Gahagan. It is Irish, entirely Irish and nothing but Irish. No wonder that Joseph Murphy, the veteran author and player of the character, became rich and famous and that the sons of the old sod, and likewise the daughters, could not be kept away from the theatre when this play was on the boards. Now that the Kalems have gone to Ireland and have brought back with them the true atmosphere and every real characteristic of the Irish soil and the Irish heart there will be a tremendous revival of "The Kerry Gow" all over the country.

There is nothing new or startling about the plot of the play. It is of that ancient pattern wherein the villain seeks to wrest the beautiful daughter from the bosom of the hero just because he holds the mortgage on the father's cottage. The story ends with the villain on his way to jail and the lovers getting ready for the marriage feast. The charm and power of this version of the old play come from the romantic little by-plays so dear to the Irish heart, the displays of Irish humor veering from the subtle to the rollicking and back again and always close to the fountain of tears, from the singular idyllic charm of the Irish landscape, from the excellent acting and the unmistakable air of realism with which this company has invested all its Irish plays. The attention to details, without which a play like this would lose much on its way from the stage to the celluloid, does infinite credit to the director. When the action of the play calls for the interior of a country lawyer's office nothing will do but a real interior of a country lawyer's office to which the camera pays a careful visit. A real "Dan," works in a real blacksmith shop and even the "Dinny Doyle," who peers over the fence and hears the villains plotting and rejoicing, is the kind that you would expect to meet on an Irish country road on a work-day's afternoon.

The romantic and pathetic by-plays make a veritable "embarrassment of riches," there is the clever escape of Dan from the castled prison; there is the fine scene beneath the prison walls when the rescuers come and help the bold hero into the boat and laugh at the shots of the guards; there is the stuttering sergeant, a most exquisite bit of comedy; there is the steeplechase, a real race, as you can see by watching the horses swerve as they near the hurdles at full speed, then the fight after the race, for as Mr. Olcott observed in delightful parenthesis as he sat beside the reviewer, "there is always a fight after an Irish race." I cannot begin to spread out all the gems before the eyes of the expectant exhibitor and must leave some things at least to the picture itself, but I cannot refrain from mentioning the very pretty and thrilling incident of the three carrier pigeons. These birds are released from the race track, where the race is run, which will bring either the money to pay off the mortgage or make complete the despair of poor Patrick Drew, whose part was rendered with consummate artistic skill by E. O'Sullivan. The first messenger brings the good news that the opening heat of the race has been won by the right horse. The second bird carries the news of the defeat of the horse in the second heat. The interest now centers in the third and final heat and the suspense is shared between the people on the screen and the audience. On the lawn in front of a lovely old-fashioned Irish cottage the friends of the villain and the friends of the old man are waiting anxiously; there is some very fine acting all-around, when the long-expected pigeon is seen to flutter down into the group. Alas-the bird has lost the message; the suspense is growing insupportable, when brave Jack comes riding into the scene with the happy tidings, that the right horse was first past the post in the final heat and the money is paid to the foiled Hay. There is some more fancy foiling right on top of this, for Hay is arrested on the charge of having "planted" a number of the forbidden pikes in Dan's shop.

Jack J. Clark made a splendid Dan O'Hara, Alice Hollister acquitted herself well as Nora Drew and every other part was well taken and fitted splendidly into the toute ensemble. Mr. Sidney Olcott "doubled" as Major Gruff and Kiernan, the drunkard. He showed rare histrionic skill in these minor, but important parts. As he acted in the capacity of director an extra word of praise for him at the end of these lines seems not out of place.

ESSANAY COLLEGE PICTURE.

Theodore Wharton, of the Essanay producing forces, returned the past week from Ithaca, N. Y., with one of the finest films of college life ever made. The Essanay camera operator has covered the ground thoroughly, and not a phase of the college routine of daily life was overlooked. The football season being at its height, splendid views of the Cornell varsity team in one of the season's big games were secured, also many comedy features in which the freshmen participate. Over a full reel alone of scenic beauty was obtained, including views of the famous Triphammer and Fall Greek Falls, and wonderful views of the Cayuga Valley, one of the garden spots of the world. This film should prove a distinct feature subject, and is booked for December release.

LUBIN BASEBALL CLUB DINES.

The Annual Dinner of the Lubin Baseball Club was given at the Majestic Hotel, Philadelphia, last Thursday. Nearly 100 plates were in order and the banquet was a most successful function. Siegmund Lubin and Ira Lowry and all of the heads of departments were present. The menu furnished by the hotel was excellent, and appropriate speeches were in order. After the café noir, a vaudeville and picture show was given on the stage, all of the performers being members of the Lubin stock companies and many of the numbers being new and arranged especially for the occasion. The management of the affair was under the direction of William Kerry and Joseph Smiley, who are entitled to thanks for the perfect and picturesque arrangements

"The Fire-Fighter's Love" (Selig).

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THE first of a remarkable series of film subjects, in which the stories are built around thrilling fire scenes, will be released by the Selig Polyscope Co., Nov. 21st, under the title, "The Fire-Fighter's Love."

For over a year Wm. N. Selig has been providing for the production of these films. He has purchased fire engines, hose carts, ladders and other equipment required for fighting fires, and from his large force in the Chicago plant he has formed a well drilled and efficient engine company, a hose company and the nucleus of a hook and ladder company. These men, whenever they appear in a fire film, are always under the direction of an expert fire official, and it is "dollars to doughnuts" that no amateur "breaks" can be discovered in the action of the Selig fire fighters.

A visitor to the Selig plant these days will be surprised to find a large section of the ground built over so as to represent the street and buildings of a big city. These scenes will all be utilized in the production of the series of fire pictures already referred to. The burning box factory, shown in "The Fire-Fighter's Love," is one of the buildings in the temporary city section of the grounds and, in turn, all the other buildings will fall a prey to the fire fiend.

"The Fire-Fighter's Love" has been adapted from Carl Chapin's short story, "The Test," by Chris Lane. Interest centers on the love of two firemen, of the same company, for the same girl. The bravery and gallantry shown by one of these men to save the life of the other, and the rescue of both by their mates when all hope seemed to have disappeared, are thrills that grip one masterfully.

Producer Oscar Eagle and the Selig carpenter have succeeded in giving a most realistic representation of the falling of the floors of the burning building and of the penning in of the two firemen in the basement, where one of them is caught by the timbers so that he lies on his back, while the water rises slowly and threatens a terrible death. I have viewed several fire scenes in moving pictures, but never before have I seen one that impressed me with such realism as did this basement scene.

Chas. Clary and Wm. Stowell, as the rival firemen, necessarily command chief attention throughout. They give strong and most fitting characterizations of Steve Lantry and Dan McCormick, respectively, and no department fire fighter in any city may be ashamed of the grit, courage and dare-devil gallantry displayed by them. Miss Adrienne Kroell, who appears in the role of Violet Dale, the sweet bone of contention between the rivals, has realized fully all the possibilities of the part. The other people in the cast have acquitted themselves commendably, and Producer Eagle is to be complimented for careful rehearsal in the principal scenes and on the uniform merit of the production.

Dan McCormick and pretty Violet Dale are looked upon as lovers by the members of Engine Company No. 13, to which Dan belongs. Certainly it was not Dan's fault that his expectations fell flat. It was rather the fickleness of woman, as revealed in the case of charming Violet, when she cast eyes on Steve Lantry, Dan's companion in many dangers and tight places.

Poor Dan was awakened to his actual standing with his sweetheart by a letter which read: "Sorry, I find I was wrong in thinking I cared for you. All must end between us, as I am engaged to Steve Lantry." Soon after reading this missive, Dan confronts Violet in company with Steve and harsh words are passed. This bitterness is still further shown in the firemen's quarters, a few minutes later, when Dan attacks Steve and is worsted.

Sore at heart, Dan gives way to drink, and comes into the bunk room that night in an intoxicated condition, a very grave infraction of the rules. He insolently offers Steve a drink from a flask, but is refused. Admonished by one of the older firemen, he puts the flask in his pocket and goes to bed.

That night an alarm comes in to No. 13 and, in a short time, the engine and hose cart companies are on the scene of the fire. While the hoses are playing on the flames, a squad of men are led into the burning factory to attack the flames at closer quarters. Steve and Dan are among the foremost, and the fire fighters are soon lost sight of in the dense smoke.

After fierce fighting of the flames and almost stifled by the atmosphere, the men hear a cry that the walls are about to fall. The order to get out of the building is being obeyed when Steve discoveres that Dan is missing. He knows that Dan is still on the floor above and, breaking loose from his companions, who attempt to hold him, he goes back to the rescue. Just as he reaches Dan's side, the walls fall out and the floors crash to the basement.

Steve is brought back to consciousness by the fall of water on his head. He is almost in darkness and finds that he is hemmed in on all sides by fallen timbers and debris. He fails to catch sight of Lantry and makes herculean efforts to free himself. He succeeds, and after a short search discovers Dan lying on his back unconscious, with both legs pinned by heavy timbers. To his horror he also discoveres that Dan is lying in water that is rising steadily to his mouth and nostrils.

Scene from "The Fire Fighter's Love" (Selig).

Remembering the flask of liquor which he had seen Dan place in his pocket before retiring in the bunk room, he searches for it. To his joy he finds it unbroken, and helps Dan to a deep draught. The unconscious man revives and Steve props his head up so that the water will not reach him for some time. Then discovering a pipe that runs upward he strikes it with his penknife and keeps repeating the Morse code with his taps. To his delight he hears an answer from the Captain above, and warns him that he and Dan are in danger of death from drowning. Soon Steve notices that the water is subsiding and knows that it is being pumped out.

The heroes are rescued just before utter exhaustion seizes them and are taken to the spot where Violet Dale stands anxiously awaiting Steve. The meeting results in complete reconcilliation between Dan and the lovers and all ends happily.

Tips on Titling

J. B. Clymer, of the Gaumont Company, Bursts Into Print with a Few Ideas on an Interesting Subject.

"WHAT'S in a name?" echoing down the centuries, has been answered affirmatively and negatively according to the application. "What's in a title?" is the paraphrase most interesting to the motion picture business.

In the haste to produce pictures proportionate to the ideals of histrionic and photographic art, titles and subtitles have not been accorded their due position of importance. Consequently in the majority of instances the work has been decidedly slipshod and mediocre. As to composition, spelling and grammatical correctness, the reading of many titles is sufficient to give even the proletariat a severe attack of mental jimjams. As to punctuation, it is ignored with the most charming nonchalance. Really it is an insult to the general intelligence to offer such amateurish work. Consideration of the embellishment clever titling may add makes worthy the attention needed to achieve efficiency.

A major theory in titling is to avoid stating the obvious. If we say that John wants Mary to become "his'n," why mention their names in succeeding titles unless these characters are disguised and it is impossible for the observer to recognize them? To once look at John and to be told his name is quite within the average intelligence to understand that he will carry that name throughout the picture. Reiteration is therefore tautology.

In pictures in lighter vein, especially, is there opportunity for verbal adroitness. So rich in colloquialism and idioms is English that one can aptly apply them to pictures without overstepping into the rude or vulgar. Quotations are frequently appropriate but usually are applicable only to sentimental, dramatic or tragic subjects. Consequently in titling comic pictures the titler must call upon wit and play upon words to give humorous effects.

The Gaumont Company, seeking to further burnish its product, already possessing superexcellence in photography and choice of subjects, is interested in titling. The name of a book frequently is a reason for its becoming one of the six best sellers.

Delicate is the demarcation, probably too subtle to be elucidated otherwise than specifically, between the necessity of keeping one's audience cognizant of the intent and theme, and that of keeping titles free for expressions having verve and point. Thus may the titler add color, depth and significance to the doings of the mute actors. A few instances are here recorded.

An original sub-title of the Gaumont film, "The Domestic Treasure," was: "They were happy and had many children." Adding localism and American atmosphere, the new title: "They were happy ever after and had children enough to please Roosevelt." Another: "Marry an artiste? No! A fine housekeeper she would make." The new title: "Can you imagine a tender-fingered pianist wrestling with a Hungarian Goulash?" In "The Emperor's Message" is "The little drumr er is recovering." Baldly evident it is that still is he the drummer and brevity we gain by mention of one word—"Convalescent." "The Emperor forgets for a time the cares of war." It is redundant to mention the Emperor. We would wager our lives upon his identity and there is an opportunity for felicity of expression in saying: "Forgetting the wilds of war in the pleasures of peace."

In the writing of letters is license. Witness: Former title—"My Lady: The Emperor has only one word. In an hour or two the battle will commence. Think of me as I think of you, and pray to the God of Victories for Napoleon." New title—"My Lady: Soon will the dogs of war be unleashed. Think of me as I think of you, and pray to the God of Victories for Napoleon."

"Cupid's Lottery" has the unstartling "Business life has begun again." This asserts the indisputable. Using a colloquialism, we have: "Again the pride of the bargain hunters is at work." Another: "He pleases both myself and my daughter." Not brilliantly is it illustrative and the scene suggests the lighter: "I think he has a good future in front of him"—a remarkably fine place for a future.

In "Love," about the high-falutin person in the original, is said: "Since his experience Onesimus writes nothing but scientific treatises." To the mind of the titler a ludicrous reference and another name is more appealing to the risibles, and the new title: "Since this experience Sweet Harold confines himself to writing booklets for a dill pickle factory and essays on the frankfurter," may justify him. In another is stated: "There is no doubt that the young ladies have reached the age of 16." The word "past" is played upon and we have: "The lovelorn ones must have passed sixteen on a dead gallop."

In "The Price of Paradise" is evinced that the gentleman is enamoured of the girl. Again the eternal obvious: "Mr. Varnier loses his heart to Suzanne." A pertinent phrase, felicitous in euphony, pleasantly usable, is "Love levels barriers." In the succeeding scene is "Mr. Varnier asks the landlady for her daughter's hand." This is hackneyed, whereupon in the amended: "An offer of a heart and a fortune," accent is thrown upon the significance that his fortune, not his heart, is the magnet.

In this film, Raymond, who has been previously named, is conspicuously in the throes of a disappointed love. To say that "Raymond is filled with despair" is to again employ an expression decidedly the worse for wear. The substitution is "Anguish."

"The reading of the will." Here emphasis lies upon the will containing injunction forbidding remarriage under penalty of being deprived of the testator's fortune. "The will of the dead" is therefore the sententious, laconic substitute.

Clear to the naked eye, or to the spectacled to the utmost, is the fact that in the title "The Meeting" two people are meeting. Anybody who doubted it should surely be given sympathy. However, a fair phrase or quotation can happily here be placed. The selection is "Till Death Doth Us Part," meaning as the picture conveys that no more ambitious mothers or the lures of wealth will intervene.

Instances might be multiplied indefinitely. The character and attention to them paid is exemplar of the Gaumont Company's belief that the name is worth the game.

EXTRAORDINARY OFFICIAL REPORT ON THE INFLUENCE OF CINEMATOGRAPHY.

The striking influence of what is now most appropriately called "the ubiquitous cinematograph" comes by way of a special report from the American Consulate at Belgrade. The first notification is the sudden adoption and growth of American fashions as a result of moving picture exhibitions. This is not the outcome of any special effort; but as a result of the natural impressions caused by the general run of American-made pictures. There is a great demand now for clothes, hats, shoes and other goods of American make; even the hairdressers are helped in that American styles are being called for.

It has already been shown that a higher grade of reading in this country has resulted from the showing of many of the better pictures, so that not only has there been an educational impetus, but an increasing demand is made upon publishers generally. The consulate reporting says: "The obvious moral of all this is that the cinematograph might be used to great advantage in showing all kinds of American products."

Instancing the fact that pictures of American agricultural scenes will create a demand for the kind of implements used, over and over again there has been recorded the value of home scene views and industrial pictures. It is worthy of the film makers' notice that in producing good and especially instructive pictures, far more results than the mere illustrations are dependable upon the exhibition of them. The pictures themselves are asked for in repetition, and their value increased accordingly. It is also suggested as an economical plan, in that it provides a substitute for costly and cumbersome exhibits, a whole factory, warehouse and showrooms are wrapped within a film, going into widely scattered directions, away from the few commercial centers; the operator becoming unconsciously one of the greatest salesmen on record. Again the influence of the cinematograph is reaching out in always new directions, so that it bids well to become as universal and as necessary as the sun itself, from whence it draws its powers.

"The Faith Healer." (Reliance)

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS play abandons the conventions after the early scenes in dealing with the widely discussed question which has inspired a great religious movement in our midst and leads up to a very strong situation. The roles are all well assigned, that of Irving Cummings being particularly fortuitous, and there is enough characterization to keep the story going, but I am impressed that it was worth a larger presentation. Within the limitations of the thousand foot reel it is difficult to produce any photoplay of complex emotion or psychological substance as no time is given for strongly placing the leading characters in a given environment so that the audience may learn to understand and enter into sympathy with them.

Under these hampering conditions the story plunges directly into a triangle situation—overworked husband, butterfly wife and false friend— and is developed with great delicacy. The wife is not faithless, and no particular reason is given why she should be, but she enjoys being tempted and permits a gentleman of leisure to satisfy her inordinate longing for flattering attentions. The husband has sacrificed his emotional nature to his daily occupation with a result that is a common experience among childless couples. He is partially blind to his wife's gradual alienation and becomes completely so from the strain his work has imposed.

Scenes from "The Faith Healer" (Reliance)

The average audience is deeply interested in the mistakes of married couples, in their misapprehensions, differences of opinion, and dissentions, especially when there are two sides to the question, because these are common enough in actual existence and often lead to tragic separation or delightful comedy situations. In a two-reel production there would have been time in the preliminary scenes to have gone deeper into human nature and traced the gradual drifting apart of husband and wife instead of dismissing these interesting details rapidly and conventionally—to go deeper into the life portrayal of leading characters is one of the great advantages the photodrama is permitted to enjoy over the stage presentation, where only three or four scenes of importance can be shown.

The triangle situation is wrung out in the stress of rapid action by the late discovery of a blind husband that his eyes were never really very wide open. He overhears a conversation between his wife and false friend that leads him to think that his life is irretrievably ruined and he gives her the freedom she desires. He leaves her and wanders aimlessly, a ghastly searcher for some natural end to the life he can no longer support in such supreme agony of mind. Like many a man of crushed egotism, he reaches a stage of profound humility which changes his attitude toward the world and toward his own soul. Drawing together the scattered forces of his mind, he centers them upon his condition of utter despair and sinks down in a wood to offer all that is left of his soul to its creator. He kneels in prayer and finds that his sense of irremediable ill vanishes, while his heart becomes irradiated by new hopes.

The play has now entered upon the borders of soul tragedy, one of the noblest form of dramas that can be shown upon the screen. A mountain lass finds him and leads him to a very simple home, and he is given assistance by those whose sympathies have been sharpened by their own hardship and suffering. There is a sick child in the house, and he is permitted to care for it during enforced absence of the family. His gratitude awakened by their kindness, he resorts to the only expression of appreciation in his power and humbly begs that the influence which calmed and sustained his own faltering spirit be exerted in behalf of the little one. The tiny bundle of nerves and dimples he is holding becomes endowed with new vitality,—nature always makes for health—it recovers miraculously, and the blind man is credited with possessing in an extraordinary degree those powers sometimes exerted in auto-suggestion. He is immediately proclaimed a "Faith Healer."

A parallel is now drawn between the devotion of this humbled man to his fellow creatures and the self-indulgent careers of the faithless wife and false friend. The most appropriate punishment fate doles out to such people is matrimony, and, accordingly, the wife secures a divorce and marries the man who attempted to dishonor the institution of marriage. In a larger play, the result of an aimless form of existence could have been shown, but, again, the action is concentrated upon an unaccounted-for stroke of paralysis which makes the second husband quite as unfit as the first. The steps to this retribution would have been highly effective, but a brief presentation of the false friend's condition was all that there was room for, and the converging of lines naturally begins.

The blind man has now taken up the work of healing the morbidly sick and weak-willed individuals unable to throw off disease, until his fame spreads, and he gathers groups of unfortunates to work upon their emotions with prayer and thus disassociate their minds from over-contemplation of their afflictions. He cures paralysis that is maintained if not induced by nervous dred, and news of his strange art reaches the ears of his divorced wife while she is attending to her second husband in a sanitorium.

A powerful situation is now set up. The dishonored husband is led by the mountain lass to visit the sanitorium and exert his influence for the betterment of the man and woman who were directly responsible for his own humiliation and sorrow. They are unware of the identity of the famed healer, and he is equally ignorant of their own, when he is brought into the room where they are expectantly awaiting him. Their recognition is immediate and painful. He is impressed by their silense, is keenly sensitive to those tiny details which situation and he indentifies the wife the moment she is within his reach.

Now comes the tremendous struggle between those primitive impulses of the human male which have made him the most terrible hater in the world and that modification of them which has been produced by self-abnegation and newly-awakened sympathy for human weakness in general. It is a soul struggle, that of a man's finer self with his baser self, and it ends consistently and artistically, but all too abruptly. Mr. Cummings in the title role was supported by faithful Gertie Robinson as the country lass, Elsa Lorimer as the wife and Ralph Lewis as the persona non grata, altogether an able cast, well directed in an original and interesing story.

"The Compact" (Pathe)

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS is a drama of substitution, in which one character takes the place of another, Mr. Wilbur Crane playing both parts on the stage at the same time in one of the most remarkable examples of double exposure yet shown on the screen. The talented actor in his twin roles and charming Octavia Handworth are the whole performance, so completely dominating the ancient situation—it dates back to Aristotle—that we overlook its sheer impossibility and enjoy the fine acting straight through.

Wilbur Crane first appears in the role of a district attorney on the eve of delivering his address in a celebrated case. He is already a victim of the drug habit, and the strain of the trial has led him to overindulgence in the stimulant—he is, in fact on the verge of nervous prostration if not complete dissolution. District Attorney Blair thus finds himself at the point of collapse when he has reached the height of his career and cannot rouse his overworked mind by the means formerly employed on great occasions. His desperate condition attracts the attention of his loving wife, and she tries her best to inspire him with new energy. She adores the sound of the voice that won her and would hear it again in eloquent denunciation of a notorious criminal. She enters her husband's office and pleads with him so earnestly that he promises to make a tremendous effort for her sake.

James Gary, an attorney of ability not yet demonstrated from lack of opportunity, writes to Blair that he has been watching the latter's able handling of the case with high admiration and would like to become a member of his staff. Gary promises to call on the afternoon of his letter's delivery and appears in Blair's outer office as the latter is making a despairing effort to rouse his deadened mental faculties. We see the district attorney seated in his private office and Gary in the outer room, one man the duplicate of the other except in the matter of clothes; then the vigorous and healthy caller is ushered into the presence of the man who has overdrawn his resources, and Crane Wilbur in one role meets Crane Wilbur in the other, face to face.

There is no visible line of separation in this double exposure; the whole scene was apparently taken in both cases, one portraying the action of District Attorney Blair and the other dealing solely with the movements of aspiring Lawyer Gary, and there must have been a lot of skill used in timing the double action as well as in printing it. Their expressions and movements are in strict harmony with what two different men might be expected to do in a single scene. They evince surprise on meeting each other and in noting the marvelous resemblance, converse, one listening while the other talks, and the caller takes a seat in response to the visible invitation extended by the district attorney. The latter instantly sees a way out of his difficulties, and the two frame up a scheme for Gary to sum up for Blair while the latter secures much-needed repose as briefless Gary.

While the action is masked by another scene, the two men change clothes, and each becomes the other beyond the shadow of a doubt. The lawyer takes up the papers of the case, with which he is already somewhat familiar as a student of contemporaneous trials, and prepares to enter upon the duties of the district attorney so far as finishing the case is concerned. The drug fiend goes back to the boarding house of the lawyer and there indulges his weakness for intoxicating agents to the limit.

When the substitution is apparently complete, when the false district attorney has mastered his difficult role, a new and thrilling element is injected by a call of Blair's wife at the office. She is amazed to note the glow of health and evidences of well-balanced mind where she had reason to look for a man weakened by mental strain and other causes more than half guessed by her. In an access of emotion she falls into Cary's arms and nearly overwhelms him with wifely endearments—all the old passion he had once roused in her being stimulated anew by his splendid condition.

The situation is a delicate one and is delicately handled by director and actors, but it contains some food for thought. No one, not even his egotistical self, is so much affected by the physical and emotional deterioration of a husband in consequence of too much devotion to the material and intellectual affairs of life as the wife. The real man for her must be a well-balanced one. Those benedicts who are too much absorbed in coining the mighty dollar take notice that there is an incompatibility between love and low vitality.

The decaying husband is presented at this moment in all the hideous weakness of his decadence, in the advanced stage of the fantasia which immediately precedes the complete withdrawal of the mind from external things. He is in the lawyer's poor room, in the lawyer's poor clothes, in the lawyer's poor situation and on the edge of being confined to the lawyer's bed by the mortal langour of relaxing disease, while the woman who should be the object of his tenderest love is becoming wildly enthusiastic over his temporary substitute. He has given up his dearest possession for a mess of pottage.

Scenes from "The Compact" (Pathe).

The substitute District Attorney goes before the court—this in an admirable ensemble—and there conducts his forceful summing-up in such a masterly fashion that it is generally conceded to be the speech of his life. He is congratulated on all hands, and especially by the proud wife. She sees in him the reincarnation of the ideal she worshipped when she married John Blair. When it becomes necessary to tell her the truth—this is done in Blair's private office, she has the appearance of a deeply disappointed woman. The man she loves is the normal one, the mere matter of his nomenclature being a secondary consideration.

Sorrowfully the temporary substitute and his pseudo wife go in search of the man of weak indulgences and they find him stretched out on Gary's bed in what appears to be a state of torpor. A closer examination reveals that his life has faded away. What shall they do? Shall the police be notified that District Attorney Blair was a degenerate drug fiend, or shall that odium be put upon the unknown Gary? It is hastily decided that the married man's good name shall be preserved, and then his substitute rushes out for the cop. On the return, the bottle of dope accounts for the manner of death, but does not to casual observer why the supposed District Attorney and his wife were in such a place. They are allowed to leave unquestioned and are next seen entering the limousine to drive to her home. She asks him to come in—she nearly pulls him in—but he is very much of a gentleman and suggests that they be secretly married and thus preserve the deception.

There was room for another thousand feet or two—I would have liked to have seen how they got along together, but that ends the fascinating picture.

The Moving Picture Educator

THE MOVING PICTURE TRIUMPHANT.

THE exhibition of pictures in the great auditorium of the John Wanamaker store in New York, on October 14, before an audience of more than one thousand clergymen and their wives was a great victory for and compliment to the moving picture. But two years ago, this same audience would have exclaimed with disdain, "Perish the thought!" at the merest suggestion of their attendance at a moving picture exhibition. On this occasion one of the leading men in America, John Wanamaker, a statesman, merchant and notable church worker, granted the use of his magnificent auditorium and its great organ; a clergyman made the opening announcement and one of the most eminent city quartettes rendered appropriate music.

This means that something in the way of a great change has come over the whole realm of the moving picture. That this is so is undoubtedly true. One does not have to look far for the cause. The rapid advance along educational lines is responsible.

At this recent exhibition, the subject shown was the great attraction, the cinematograph being but the instrument of usage, even as a means to an end. This is in itself a sufficient proof as to how the moving pictures may at once be made helpful and valuable besides making an ever-increasing number of friends. Scores of ministers are at the present time seeking information upon the cost and requirements of the adaptability of the moving picture as one of their auxiliaries to church, institutional and neighborhood work. This means that another stage has been reached in both the onward and upward progress for which many have been striving. Those most intimately connected with this recent development are feeling very satisfied that both their ideas and labors are being so thoroughly appreciated and successful, and do not hesitate to anticipate a still larger future.

THE PICTURE PLACE IN SMALL TOWNS FROM AN EDUCATIONAL VIEWPOINT.

A visit to a number of representative small towns reveals the fact that the educational features of the moving picture are sadly neglected. Indeed, the average exhibition in the small town is somewhat mediocre. The several reasons for this may be that the smaller exhibitor is usually a man of less cultivated taste than his city contemporary, or express rates and railway fare make necessary the use of a cheaper grade of service. Under any circumstances, however, there seems to be no reason why at least once a week a good educational may not be included. Surely the average exhibitor reads his trade paper, which leads him to keep both abreast of the times and in line with that which is to his best advantage. During a little critical survey of some of these out-of-town places, the writer was easily able to distinguish between the exhibitor who read the Moving Picture World and the one who did not.

It was apparent in the case of the man who only ran the show to make it pay him an income, that his interest went no further than a sufficient return in dimes; too short sighted to know that with the same conditions, but with other pictures, his dimes would become dollars.

Further inquiry showed that where no educational or large subject pictures were shown, not only had the "house" neither influence or standing in the community, but too often rested under that old "ban" which in the majority of instances had been lifted long ago. Mr. Exhibitor, use a few educational pictures. You will secure a better recognition from those people in your town it pays best to please. Your audiences also will (as they always do) speak of your show as having some "food" in it, rather than being all "chaff."

The manufacturer has proved what kind of pictures are the most satisfactory; by following his example the small-town exhibitor must refuse to be treated as the "small fry" of the trade.

NOTES.

The attempted assassination of Col. Roosevelt was not an event of the kind to magnify a degenerate. The film makers who sought to bail the culprit so that they might "film him" were certainly not looking for a high subject. Failing to have the prisoner liberated on bail to please them, their endeavor to secure a tramp to impersonate him was a piece of still lower and degrading work. Happily there are film manufacturers who have plenty of good subjects on hand without degenerating to yellow journalism in pictures.

In educational films the "scenic" seems to be having preference for the time being, with a promise of something like a "run" on Biblical pictures. In this latter class, care must be taken that familiarity does not "breed contempt." With scenic pictures it is impossible to err from the original; they are always true and fill their purpose. Southern Italy and the islands of Malta and Sicily form a group from the Cines Company. "Across the Broad Pacific," by Essanay; "A Trip Through Belgium," from the Eclipse; "National Park Glacier," by Pathe; "In Asiatic Turkey," by Eclair, and "The Panama Canal," by the Gaumont Company, make a most substantial addition to this class of educational productions.

The topical films continue to chronicle the events of the times, and so the Naval Review in New York is variously classed with the scenic, topical and, it may also be said, historical pictures; while, as it may be shown in places and among people who could not see the review, it becomes both instructive and patriotic. A combined scenic and educational film comes from the Edison studio entitled, "Cashmere, the Chief Health Resort of India." Distinctly industrial pictures are: "Removing Sunken Vessels," Edison; "The Noodle Industry," Lubin; "The Sulphur Industry," Eclair; with "Bee Culture" and "Tulip Studies" from he Kinemacolor Company, who also announce "Picturesque Scenes on the Potomac River." All of these are of value and instructive while pleasing; it is a pleasure to be able to chronicle such a goodly additional list in the educational series.

The question was asked a few months ago as to why the scenic beauties of America were not filmed? The point was raised, that all the world ought to be made acquainted with this wonderful country about which some nations have only wrong and suspicious opinions and impressions.

"The American Rhine" (Kalem) is a welcome film; readily understood as the Hudson River, it will reveal to all not acquainted with its natural beauties many surprises. Although there are pictures of several beauty spots in the United States, there are not enough at present. This picture is both an addition and a forerunner of others of its kind.

To lessen the number of accidents to pedestrians and other traffic in which tramcars are concerned, the Dusseldorf tramway authorities are exhibiting a specially prepared kinematograph film at a local town planning exhibition. The film shows what happens to an elderly passenger, who steps off a moving tramcar in the wrong way; on the other hand, a young lady is depicted leaving a car in a proper manner, with calmness and elegance. The right way for vehicles to pass tramcars is also shown. The Vienna municipal authorities are also considering the need of exhibiting similar films in the Austrian capital.

The Paris Figaro has invited the great literary and dramatic lights of France to express themselves on the motion picture. It submits the following specific questions: 1.—Do you believe that the motion picture has reached its zenith? Do you think the public taste for the pictures is growing or diminishing? 2.—Do you think that the motion picture and the theater should be friends or enemies? 3.—In your opinion, will the motion picture with its swiftness of action and its thrills permanently influence public taste and then react on the legitimate stage? Various members of the Academie Francaise have sent in answers. The opinions are varied, but, on the whole, favorable to the future development of the industry.

"The Tribal Law" (Bison)

By G. F. Blaisdell.

BISON is on the right track. Here we have an Indian story, to be sure. It is not, however, of the orthodox sort—burning, raiding, soldiers to the rescue, and all of the regular program. It is a story of Indians as Indians, and in it are shown the habitations, the mode of life, some of the customs. Here we are with the Hopis, and we see them in the old pueblos. Otis Turner puts on the picture, and he is to be congratulated on his success in producing a drama of deep interest. There are some fine bits of photography—sharp, with plenty of quality.

Miss Margarita Fischer plays the part of Starlight, the Hopi maiden who falls in love with the young Apache Carlisle graduate, José Seville, splendidly portrayed by Wallace Reid. Charles Inslee as Crouching Panther, the Hopi warrior, does fine work. Forming the background for these are many Indians, lending to the play an appearance of actuality and creating an illusion that holds. There is a good picture of a pueblo, with ladders reaching to the second story. We see the interior of a Hopi home, with the natives grinding meal between stones, in the primitive way. There is a realistic representation of the cauterization of a rattlesnake bite — the excision of the infected part, the heating of the ramrod, and the burning of the affected tissues. Also, we see the snake as he is coiled to strike—an unusual picture. Throughout the two reels the action is fast, the interest sustained.

Margarita Fischer in Hopi Tribal Costume.

The basis of the story is an old edict, issued as the result of one of the tribal differences, that death shall be meted out to the Hopi woman who marries an Apache. Crouching Panther is struck by a rattlesnake, and goes to the camp of a party of surveyors. A member of the group, José, the Apache graduate of Carlisle, moves quickly. He cauterizes the wound and starts the Panther on his way home. A short time afterward José, on a hunting expedition, encounters a trap arranged for some animal and falls, badly hurt. His cries are heard by Starlight, who releases him and takes him to her home. As the injury mends, the two fall in love, which arouses the jealousy of Gray Wolf, a Hopi, himself in love with Starlight. There is a tribal marriage ceremony, in which the entire Indian community participates. Following the wedding the husband assumes the garb of a Hopi. As he appears before the bride in his abbreviated costume she discovers on the breast of José the mark of the Apache. In terror she tells José of the old edict—that she must die if his antecedents are revealed. Jose puts on a shirt, but Gray Wolf has discovered his origin. The chief is informed, and the two are seized. Starlight is forced to run the gantlet. Surviving this ordeal, she is thrown into a room of the pueblo, there to starve. Jose is bound to the side of the pueblo, to undergo the fate of his bride.

Just following the marriage ceremony, Crouching Panther has returned and has most cordially greeted José, having in mind the signal service the Apache had rendered him on the occasion of the snakebite. The Panther was unable to save Starlight from her punishment, but he goes to José at his first opportunity, assuring him of his help. The watcher by the side of Jose is caught off his guard and put out of the way. A second Indian likewise is quickly disposed of. The two then go to the relief of Starlight. She is lifted up to the second floor, where the party await an opportunity to elude the vigilance of the tenants of the strange abode. They are all astir, and there is an animated picture. Finally the three mount horses and ride to the border. There at the dividing line between Mexico and the United States the Hopi gives José raiment and belt and pistols. As the light fades the Panther stands watching the two ride into the night. José had saved his life when he was injured. The Panther has saved two lives.

SCREEN CLUB COMMITTEES.

At the meeting of the Screen Club on Saturday night, President King Baggot announced the appointment of the following committees:

Membership—King Baggot, chairman; John Bunny, Calder Johnstone, Harry R. Raver, C. A. Willat, Herbert Brenon and C. Jay Williams.

House—John Bunny, chairman; Harry R. Raver, C. A. Willat, J. H. Gerhardt, James Kirkwood and Hopp Hadley.

Auditing—J. H. Gerhardt, chairman; Joe Miles and Charles M. Seay.

Ways and Means—John Bunny, chairman; Calder Johnstone, Harry R. Raver, C. A. Willat, Herbert Brenon, Oscar Apfel.

Relief—Tefft Johnson, chairman; Henry Walthall, William Steiner, Charles Handworth and Hal Wilson.

Entertainment—Victor Smith, chairman; George Terwilliger, Harry R. Raver, Pierce Kingsley, J. H. Gerhardt, Darwin Karr, Maurice Costello, Calder Johnstone, C. Jay Williams, William Robert Daly, Arthur Johnson, G. F. Blaisdell, Bert Adler, P. Thad Volkmann, T. Hays Hunter, William Garwood, Charles Abrams, Alfred H. Saunders, C. A. Willat, Hopp Hadley and William Quirk.

Press—Calder Johnstone, chairman; G. F. Blaisdell, S. M. Spedon.

Educational—C. Jay Williams, Carl A. Laemmle and Herbert Blache.

Arts, Literature and Records—Eustis H. Ball, chairman; John Bunny, S. M. Spedon, Calder Johnstone, C. A. Willat and Harry R. Raver.

President Baggot announced that the new quarters of the club, at 163 West Forty-fifth Street, will be ready for occupancy in a few days. Rapid progress is being made in putting the rooms in shape, and it is confidently expected that by Election Night the club rooms will be thrown open to the members. The treasurer reported $4,000 in hand.

BRADENBURGH OPENS NEW YORK OFFICE.

G. W. Bradenburgh, of Philadelphia, has opened a branch of his film business in Room 1011, Exchange Building, 145 West 45th Street, New York City. The New York branch will handle features and rent independent pictures. It will be in charge of Mr. John Child, who has been connected with Mr. Bradenburgh for several years.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

EXHIBITORS REJECT CIGARETTE SELLING PLAN.

IT is gratifying to the Moving Picture World to note the attitude of exhibitors toward the plan of a certain tobacco company to boost the sale of its cigarettes through the instrumentality of the picture theaters of the country. We note herewith the action taken by the New Jersey and the Philadelphia leagues and by several individuals and, while the action indicated was taken prior to the publication of the Moving Picture World's opinion of the proposition in its issue of November 2nd, it proves that the World is in accord with the best thought among the exhibitors for the maintenance of the highest standard of the picture theater.

Here is what exhibitors think of the cigarette proposition:

Greenwood A. Robinson, of West Hoboken, president of the New Jersey Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, issues a statement concerning efforts on the part of cigarette manufacturers to induce the members of the league to traffic in such things.

"Several efforts have been made to get the owners and managers of the motion picture houses throughout the State to traffic in cigarettes through the medium of the premium plan," says Mr. Robinson.

"We discussed the matter in conference, and determined against it. The following resolution was passed concerning the matter, and is a full expression of our attitude:

"'Whereas, cigarette manufacturers have tried to induce members of our organization to traffic in cigarettes through the medium of the premium plan, and

"'Whereas, we, the members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New Jersey, are adverse to the use of cigarettes, in as much as they are injurious to the good health of youths, therefore be it

"'Resolved, that no member of this organization accept the offers of the cigarette manufacturers aforesaid, and we apprise the public through the medium of the press, that we are always ready to reject any proposition that will affect the health or morals of our patrons.'"

Philadelphia Turns Plan Down.

Philadelphia, October 28th, 1912.

Editor Moving Picture World,
New York City.

Dear Sir: At the last meeting of the Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia Local Motion Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania No. 2), after debate upon the question unanimously agreed that the exhibitors protest against the plan of the American Tobacco Company relative to redeeming coupons as per their circular of October 18th, 1912, on the grounds that it would be a nuisance and would encourage the tobacco habit among the younger children.

Yours truly,
J. LOUIS BREITINGER.

Won't Encourage Cigarette Smoking.

Philadelphia, October 26th, 1912.

Editor Moving Picture World,
New York, N. Y.

Dear Sir: I am enclosing a circular letter received from the American Tobacco Company, 111 Fifth Avenue, New York. You can see what this letter means and is intended for. To-day a salesman representing the above company called to see me in reference to the letter and I turned his offer down. He asked my reason and I told him that the proposition didn't meet with my approval, and I didn't think it right to encourage any one, especially children, to use cigarettes. I want the good will, not the ill will of our patrons, and I can't see how any moving picture manager or proprietor is to benefit by this proposition, and if I could speak for them all I would say NO. Yours truly,

JOHN F. HAYES,
Manager, Federal Hall Auditorium, Federal St.
Also Hayes Palace, Gloucester, N. J.

Idea Is Detrimental.

South Manchester, October 24th, 1912.

Editor The Motion Picture World.

Dear Sir: Enclosed please find check for subscription. . . . Now a word in regard to the new scheme of the American Tobacco Company's putting out ½ ct. coupons in cigarettes to be honored by motion picture theaters. I think the idea detrimental to moving pictures, and think you should warn managers and owners. Yours,

W. J. SIRK, Glen Theater.

KENTUCKY ANNUAL MEETING.

The next annual meeting of the Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League will be held in Louisville April 22, 23 and 24, according to an announcement by the Executive Committee, which met in Louisville recently. The next meeting of the executive body will take place at Covington on January 5. President J. H. Stamper, of Lexington, Ky., presided at the recent gathering, which was held at the Seelbach Hotel. Others present included L. H. Ramsey, of Lexington; D. C. Oldham, of Richmond; L. C. Smith, of Owensboro; J. C. Cairlo, of Covington, and Louis J. Dittmar, of Louisville. The 1912 meeting of the organization was held at Lexington. It was reported that the Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League now numbers 125 members, including every exhibitor in Kentucky of importance. Efforts are to be put forth to enroll the few who are not now affiliated with the state body.

PICTURES AND POLITICS.

Mayor Behrman, candidate for re-election to the office of mayor of the city of New Orleans, made an extensive use of moving pictures to further his candidacy. When the campaign opened, Mayor Behrman had nearly all the newspapers of New Orleans arrayed against him, but he proved that moving pictures was the best method to bring his claims for re-election before the voters. Securing the services of the Kalem Company, he had moving pictures taken of the various new public works constructed during his term of office. These were shown throughout the city, with the result that Mayor Behrman and his entire administration were returned to office about two weeks ago by a majority that was overwhelming. There is no discounting the great power of the moving picture.

PICTURE MAN HAS PROFITABLE INVENTION.

Mr. Isaac Silverman, of the firm of Silverman Brothers, owners and managers of the Photoplay Theater, Harrisburg, Pa., and the Pastime Theater, Altoona, Pa., has embarked in the manufacturing business under the firm name of the Public Service Company to manufacture the "Saniford" sanitary drinking cup. Mr. Silverman devised this cup for use in his own theaters and found it so popular, decided to manufacture the novelty for the general public. His inquiries along those lines developed a big demand for his sanitary cup and he has established a plant in Harrisburg to produce it, with orders on hand to keep him going for three months at the present capacity of his factory. This convenient drinking cup is advertised elsewhere in this issue of the Moving Picture World, as Mr. Silverman believes other theater managers will find it as welcome a novelty in their houses as he found it in his own. Mr. Silverman visited the Moving Picture World office last week in company with his Harrisburg manager, Mr. A. S. Speese. He reports very satisfactory business with his house.

FAMOUS PLAYERS COMPANY HAS PITTSBURG OFFICE.

Alexander Lichtman has opened a branch office of the Famous Players Film Company in the Empire Building, Pittsburg, Pa. Mr. Lichtman reports that "Queen Elizabeth," with Sarah Bernhardt, is meeting with big success in that city.

"Life of John Bunyan—Pilgrim's Progress"

(Five Reels).
Hochstetter Utility Company.
Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

IT may be doubted whether the life of Bunyan and his great vision are as well known and as popular in this generation and in this country as they were less than a century ago in all the Protestant English-speaking countries. There is, however, very little doubt how the average audience in an American moving picture theater of to-day would receive this production. An hour and a half of religious biography and religious allegory is too rich an offering for an assemblage of ordinary mortals. To any one not familiar with either the life and times of Bunyan or with the main characters and episodes in his immortal work, these five reels will give small pleasure or information. For schools and churches, however, this production will fill a great need. It is in the best sense of the word a religious picture.

Scene from "Life of John Bunyan."

There is a good deal in these five reels which merits praise, and but little which is justly open to censure. The acting is uniformly good, that of Mr. Oland in the part of Bunyan and Christian being highly commendable. He never descended to the melodramatic and was thoroughly in earnest all through the five reels, here and there braving great personal danger in his laudable desire to give a realistic rendering of his role. The scenes have as a rule been well selected and are with some few exceptions in keeping with the words of Bunyan's text. The same sheet of water has been used as the Slough of Despond and the River of Death; there were too many beautiful flowers on this pool to give the impression of gloom and terror, which the words of the preaching tinker call forth in every reader's mind. The appearance of Apollyon was grotesque rather than fearsome. Only the head of the monster was visible and that was so evidently moved by a mechanism that it took on the appearance of the ridiculous.

In most scenes, however, both in the biographical and the religious reels, the effect on the spectator, who is somewhat familiar with the subject was pleasing and there were moments when it was possible to feel the spiritual atmosphere and sympathize with the author of the story, who had passed through all the tribulations and triumphs of an exalted religious nature. The scenes of the trial and the composition of the jury were done with no mean skill. The life of John Bunyan was portrayed with a most careful regard to the recorded historical facts and made a very probable story indeed.

It is altogether reasonable to hope that these reels will win friends for the motion picture in circles where until now they have been held very cheap.

It must also be added that the photography in these pictures is strikingly good, many scenes being almost stereoscopic in their distinctness.

BALKAN WAR SCENES FOR GAUMONT.

The Gaumont Company, appreciating the possibilities of the conflict raging in the Balkans between Turkey and the Allies becoming strife involving all Europe, have cameramen with both the Ottoman forces and the attacking armies. With all expedition this film will be hurried to America and will be given prominence in the Gaumont Weekly current event film and the Saturday "Great Events" film. The courage of the Gaumont operators is almost proverbial and it is assured that the pictures taken of these sanguinary scenes will be vivid and stirring.

KLEINE'S CINES AND ECLIPSE RELEASES.

A remarkable drama entitled "The Queen of Spades," a drama filled with heart interest entitled "Love vs. Gratitude," a mirth-provoking drama entitled "No Fool Like an Old Fool," and a beautiful travel subject make up George Kleine's offering of releases for the week ending November 9th. A good program should contain above all else quality and variety, and it can be safely promised that these subjects meet these qualifications in every way.

"Love vs. Gratitude" is the title of the Tuesday Cines release. The story deals with a love affair between a wealthy young nobleman and a pretty actress who is a woman of the highest ideals. It is interesting indeed to follow the working out of the plot, especially the situations where she agrees to marry him because of gratitude for his assistance in time of need, but he, on the other hand, refuses to accept gratitude where true love is lacking. All obstacles are overcome and a happy wedding is brought about in a very unique manner.

To complete the reel, "The Golden Shell of Palermo" is a beautiful travelogue which takes us on a journey along the poetical Palermo shores where the scenery is simply delightful.

The Eclipse offering for Wednesday is a unique but fascinating film entirely original in subject matter as a screen production; the title is "The Queen of Spades." An ambitious young reporter is assigned to investigate a curious suicide club called "The Friends of Plato." He joins the organization just in time to attend a meeting of the members, when he is selected to be the one to fulfill the purpose of the club, namely, to end his mortal existence. The scene of his terror in the room with the barred windows through which he is able to see the "death watch," a quartette of ghastly figures, and his intense relief when his friends come to the rescue, will hold the rapt attention of any audience. The characterization of the reporter and the president of the club are especially well executed; the former portrayed as a young man of determination but inexperienced, and the latter as a hardened old villain, reserved and unrelenting. This is an exceptional feature film which will prove an addition to any program.

For the Saturday Cines, "No Fool Like an Old Fool" is a comedy drama which contains many humorous situations. The final discomfiture of the old miser who tries to out-rival his nephew in winning the affections of a charming but unsophisticated neighbor's daughter will provoke many laughs. It is a story which has been done many times but is always refreshing and immediately enlists the sympathy and interest of the audience. Dorothy Fererri, one of the most charming members of the Cines company, takes the part of the girl, and Alfred Bracci and Charles Maestro enact the roles of the young man and the old miser. The film ought to receive a very favorable reception.

A NEW MOVE BY A WESTERN HUSTLER.

We take pleasure in announcing the opening of a general Eastern sales, distributing and repairs branch for the Motiograph machines in New York City. The Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company have leased a loft at 30 East 23rd Street, and will commence business November 1st, 1912.

The establishment of this Eastern branch, including a fully equipped repair shop, is in line with the hustling policy of the Motiograph makers in extending repair facilities in the Eastern and New England states.

It is the purpose of the Motiograph makers to carry a full and complete line of machines, mechanisms and all repair parts in New York stock, and as soon as the demand justifies a competent repair man will be sent from the factory in Chicago.

The appointment of Fred A. Clark to the position of Manager of the Eastern office is in recognition of his services in the territory to be cared for by this office.

We are asked to extend a cordial invitation to all to pay a visit to the Eastern office of this well-known machine where their latest product, the 1913 Model Motiograph, will be demonstrated, begining with their opening on November 1st, 1912.

Mr. Woodward, Vice-President and General Manager of the factory, is spending two or three weeks in the East, with headquarters at the Imperial Hotel, New York City.

DOME THEATER BEING REMODELED.

Work on the repairing of the building north of the Dome Theater, a moving picture house of La Crosse, Wis., and which will soon be occupied by that theater, is being rapidly pushed along. The new addition will make the Dome one of the most up-to-date picture theaters in the City of La Crosse, and it is expected that the work will be finished by the second week in November.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

THERE is a dearth of desirable scenarios in the market just now, judging from the experience of some manufacturers. Other manufacturers state that they are getting all they want and of the kind they want. There must be a reason for this difference in experience.

There is no use in denying the fact that the quality of scenarios has, perforce, steadily risen and this has called for a better class of writers. These better equipped writers demand higher prices for their work and can always divert their talents to other channels when they fail to get those prices. Just as soon as a manufacturer comes to the conclusion that he must pay a good price for a good scenario, he will get it. And he will get as many high class scenarios as he wants, if he is willing to pay reasonable prices for them.

The trend is upward, no matter from what angle the photodrama is viewed. As the scenario is one of the principal factors in the construction, it must measure up to the demand of a keener intelligence on the part of the people who patronize motion pictures. The standard, therefore, of the scenario must steadily rise, and for the better talent required to produce it there must be proportionate remuneration.

Daniel Frohman, in a recent interview which appeared in the World, refers to the photodrama of the future as follows: "Playwriting will change. Great playwrights will develop, who will not depend upon the spoken word, but will create masterpieces in pantomime. The coming dramatist will have the entire world as an audience and his language must be a universal one—the language of motion."

In the meantime, photoplaywrights of talent must be developed, and the inducements offered them must be worthy of their efforts.

A Problem in Booking Programs.

Notwithstanding the large increase in the number of licensed regular releases weekly within the current year, it is somewhat surprising to learn from several exhibitors in Chicago that their service is not as satisfactory as it was some time ago. The dissatisfaction does not lie in any lack of quality in the films, but in failure to prevent conflicting programs with nearby competitors, and in the matter of repeaters.

The whole trouble appears to be due to the fact that some of the branches of the General Film Company do not buy more than three-fourths of the weekly output of regular releases, which naturally places them at a disadvantage when booking service for several theaters which are located in the same neighborhood. On the other hand, each branch office must be operated on business principles and show a weekly balance on the right side of the ledger. A solution of the problem, no doubt, will soon be made.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Kurt W. Linn writes from Paris, where he has made a stay of five weeks, that he will sail for New York the end of October. It is his purpose to make headquarters in New York, where his office will be located.

V. R. Day, manager of the city office of the Essanay Company, had a painful accident recently. On Thursday, October 17th, while out at the Essanay plant, on Argyle Street, he slipped on a wet floor and fell heavily, sustaining a compound fracture of the right leg. He was immediately taken to the Park Avenue Hospital, where he remained until Thursday, October 24th, when he was removed to his home. The cast was removed from his leg Wednesday, October 30th. Mr. Day expects to be able to go around on crutches in about a week. He has the hearty congratulations of many friends on his rapid recovery

Plans have been drawn for a new theater in Terre Haute, Indiana. The new house will be located on Calhoun Street and will be known as the Orpheum. The owners are Brentlinger & English. It seats 950 people and will boast of a large pipe organ, chimes and a four-piece orchestra.

BIOGRAPH PLAYER AT LIBERTY.

That motion picture work is sufficiently strong in attractiveness in affording relief from the continual travel besetting the theatrical profession is shown by the increased numbers of deserters from the ranks of the legitimate. Among the latter is Lilian Berry, who will be remembered by her clever characterization of the ingenue role in "Doctor de Luxe" and her work in support of William Gillette for two seasons and in stock houses in Boston and Seattle. Miss Berry, who is now prepared to join some motion picture stock company in the vicinage of New York, is no stranger to motion picture work, she having played leads and ingenue roles with the Western Biograph Company.

"At the Sign of the Flaming Arcs."

By G. F. Blaisdell.

IF licensed exhibitors do not give their people an opportunity of seeing Hobart Bosworth play Edmond Dantes in "Monte Cristo" they are guilty of neglect. We have here the elements of a play—the story, the settings, the man, the company, and the direction. As to the first, where is there a grander? The second—Where in the wide world could be found a spot the equal of California—ocean, cliff, desert, semi-tropical vegetation? As to the man, who is there on the screen who could better portray Dantes than Bosworth? The support and the direction were of the best.

The writer, a quarter century ago, saw James O'Neill, who gave years of study to his characterization of Dantes, portray the count. The screen production makes the recollection of the stage representation seem pale. In the former we have the real ship, the real sea, the real cliffs. We do not hear the participants speak, to be sure; we do not need to. If there has ever been on the screen a scene that for dramatic quality will overmatch the accumulating climax of "Monte Cristo" it certainly would be worth going a long distance to see.

That the making of motion pictures is not all "cakes and ale" was realized by Alec Francis in the filming of "Silent Jim." The Eclair actor had been lured into a morass in the pursuit of the half-breed, and was up to his waist in water on a cool October day. Before the scene was finished it was discovered that there was no more film in the party. It was necessary to send four miles back to the city to get a fresh supply. In the meantime, Mr. Francis suffered not at all from the heat. When the missing supply reached the bog, Mr. Francis returned to his uncomfortable immersion and the scene was finished. At the Screen Club, Saturday night, the veteran actor looked hale and hearty. In spite of his uncomfortable experience Mr. Francis insists that he likes army dramas. This follows perhaps because he has had more than a taste of the real article—under the same flag, by the way, in which he was portrayed in "Silent Jim."

Kinemacolor's "Jack and the Beanstalk" will delight the hearts of the little ones—yes, and the big ones, too. There's a beautiful child in this drama of the nursery. The producer is to be congratulated for putting a boy where so many would have employed a girl—and would thereby have spoiled the illusion.

Florence Barker in "A Dreamland Tragedy" does fine work. She had a particularly good opportunity to show what she can do in straight acting. That chance came where she was sitting in a chair in the kitchen and awoke from a dream in which she had seen her father kill her brother in mistake for her sweetheart. The simulation of the dumb terror, the surprise, and the joy as she looks about her and sees in the flesh these three husky specimens of manhood will touch those who see this cleverly constructed picture.

There may be good reason why the film maker should number his reel in the middle of a scene instead of in one of the sub-titles. There can be no question, however, as to the awkwardness and unsightliness of the present scheme. To be sure, these perforations cross the vision for but a flash—a twentieth of a second, but they distract the attention; and anything which produces this result is inartistic and is to be condemned. The licensed manufacturers are the chief offenders. In some films these perforations appear three or four times.

A few weeks ago a quiet sort of cameraman was called into the office of Paris Eclair and asked if he would undertake a trip to the Balkans. After a moment's thought he replied that he would. A few days ago the same quiet sort of chap returned to Paris. He looked weary, but behind the weariness there was a look of satisfaction. The office staff realized why when, after the hasty development of the film, it was put on projection. Then it was found that he had secured some real battle scenes. The picture is on the Provence well on its way to New York, and will be released as soon as possible. The Eclair folks think they have got a big scoop.

Those who were so fortunate as to see Pathe's superb pictures of Glacier National Park in the "Seeing America First" series will be interested in knowing that the Blackfeet Indians so intimately portrayed therein adopted into their tribe with much pomp and ceremony Ralph Radnor Earle, the man who secured the pictures. Mr. Earle went to the park in August to take some "snaps" of the visit of the younger members of President Taft's family. These views were duly recorded in Pathe's Weekly. Mr. Earle remained in the park, and accompanied by fifty of the Blackfeet tribe obtained in the course of a trip some remarkably artistic pictures. His cruise up St. Mary's Lake in a launch, through water as smooth as the proverbial glass, reflecting the great snow-clad mountains in the distance; his camp beside Iceberg Lake; McDermott's Falls, a cascade of rare beauty; "the ragged edge of the mountain tops make a jagged line in the blue sky"—a panoramic view; Harrison Glacier, so clear it is possible to see objects frozen in to a depth of 200 feet; the dramatic scene where the Indians, under Chief Big Top, arrayed in their best blankets and feathers, are grouped on a great crag, their arms extended to the sky—all these are but part of a most interesting film and one that deserves preservation.

The idea of being portrayed in motion pictures strongly appealed to the Blackfeet. According to the medicine men, "it is the great thing that makes them live forever." It will—if the films are properly preserved. So enthusiastic were the Blackfeet that they invited Mr. Earle to Browning, Mont., their reservation town. In the lodge of Medicine Owl, medicine man, the picture man was formally adopted into the tribe. He was christened Mo-stow-kn-nex-poye. A liberal application of Indian colored powders transformed the "paleface" to a brave and then he was led into the circle of dancing braves, squaws and children.

J. Parker Read, the "Garden of Allah" man, has just returned to New York from Denver, where he saw made some of the concluding scenes in a two-reel educational-dramatic picture featuring Judge Ben Lindsay, the famous head of the Juvenile Court of Denver. The film is designed to show the improved methods of handling delinquent children. The picture is being made by the Cheyenne Feature Film Company, in which Mr. Read is interested. During his trip Mr. Read sold seven states of his "Garden of Allah" feature, everything now being cleaned up with the exception of a few Western states. Mr. Read is to take the American agencies for the Aquilla brand of Italy and the B. & C. of England. Mr. Read also is in correspondence with the army and navy authorities in Washington in regard to putting out a multiple-reel educational and dramatic picture intended to popularize army and navy life.

The Atlantic City (N. J.) Press, in an alleged dispatch from Philadelphia describing the visit of Lillian Russell and her last husband to Lubinville, tells how Miss Russell in laying out a sketch in which she was to appear privately, "started in to show the ordinary garden variety of moving picture actors how a real star would do it." The remark is cheap, of course. It is worthy of notice merely because there are thoughtless persons who are under the impression that anyone who has had stage experience can without preliminary training or direction step right in front of a moving film and do correct work. Bernhardt, in "Queen Elizabeth," upbraiding the Countess of Nottingham, deliberately turns her face away from the camera, showing the back of her head. It is safe to say that when any of the Famous Players appear before the camera under the direction of Edwin Porter the discovery will be made in short order that a knowledge of stage technique does not necessarily also imply a knowledge of screen technique.

Doings at Los Angeles

Biograph Company Back at Los Angeles—Selig Stock Company Gossip—Sea Elephants.

AFTER an absence of four and a half months the Biograph comedy company, chaperoned by Lew Dougherty, alias "Dockerty," scenario editor and major domo, returned to Los Angeles, October 11, to remain until next Spring. There were eighteen members in the party including G. D. Henderson, director, W. J. Butler, Edward Dillon, Grace Lewis, Miss Toncray and Gux Pixley, and they brought word that Director Griffith and the dramatic company will follow them in about a month.

The big studio at Girard and Georgia streets, which has been in the charge of a caretaker since June 1, was opened and aired the day they arrived and two days later work was in progress just as if it had never been deserted.

Some interesting gossip came along with the company. For instance, that Lionel Barrymore, the well known theatrical star, has joined Griffith's company and may go into motion pictures permanently if he decides, after a trial, that he likes the work. Charles Murray, of the comedy team Murray & Mack, whose names were household words a decade ago, has been working with the comedy company just before it left New York. Picture fans may have recognized his features in a couple of recent releases. He was the bully in "A Ten Karat Hero," and the unsuccessful suitor in "The Line At Hogans" on the same reel.

It seems that the Biograph company has a new fancy which is to employ well known actors and actresses out of the legitimate ranks to use in the motion pictures and it is predicted that a number of familiar faces may be seen in the releases from now on.

Gossip of Selig Company.

Hobart Bosworth, who has been directing one of the three Southern California companies of the Selig Polyscope Co., has retired from the position and in future will give all his time to acting in the pictures. He has been succeeded by Henry McRae who was brought on from the Chicago studio where he has been a director for some time. McRae took four members of the company this week and went to Sanger, near Fresno, California, where they outfitted for a two weeks' trip into the lumber country near the mouth of the King's river canyon. This is the section where the famous big flumes twenty miles in length bring the logs down from the mountains. The purpose of the trip was to get half a dozen thrilling scenes for a drama of the lumber country.

Lem Parker the other new director took fifteen people this week and visited the Guasti vineyard near Ontario. This vineyard, consisting of more than 4,000 acres in wine grapes, is one of the largest if not the largest in the United States. The wine making season is at its height now and Lanier Bartlett, the Selig scenario editor for the Western section, took advantage of it to write a little romantic story affording an excuse to show the many interesting scenes connected with the picking and pressing of the grapes.

Colin Campbell with his company is at the Eastlake studio of the Selig company this week where the animals are kept and where he is making another big animal picture.

It is gossip among the employees of the company, although there has been no official announcement, that another big three reel production like Christopher Columbus and Monte Cristo is at hand and that preparations for it are now in progress.

James Magee, former general manager of the Western company, is still around the plant although he has been relieved of duty so that he could be free to complete the arrangements for taking a company around the world. He will leave about January 1.

Kathlyn Williams has come on from the East to work in the western pictures and expects to remain here for the winter at least. A new member of the company is Harold Lockwood a juvenile man who joined last week.

Fred Huntley, until recently one of the directors, has returned to his original love and will work in front of the camera instead of behind it hereafter.

Frank Selig, brother of William Selig, who has been connected with the local plant for several months, has gone back to Chicago.

Mexican Sea Elephants.

One of the most remarkable reels of motion pictures ever taken has just been brought back to Los Angeles by F. E. Norton, camera man and correspondent of the Pathe Weekly, who has been exploring Lower California with a motion picture camera. The pictures show intimate views of the only known surviving herd of Mexican sea elephants in the world. They inhabit a nameless rock island 250 miles off the coast of Lower California and there are only thirty-six animals in the herd which is growing smaller year by year. Norton learned of them through an official connected with the Smithsonian Institution, which sent an expedition to the island several years ago to investigate a report that specimens of the rare animal, believed up to that time to be totally extinct, had been seen there. The expedition found them and captured several of them. Norton is probably the first person who has seen them since. In another five years they will probably be gone, but the world will have a perfect record of them for the motion pictures, upon being developed, proved to be almost perfect.

In order to obtain the pictures Norton was obliged to charter and outfit a small steamer. On arriving at the island he circled around it and found a little sandy cove on one side where the sea elephants were frolicking on the beach. It is difficult to make a landing anywhere except in the cove for the reason that the shores are high and precipitous. One of his views was taken from a point half a mile off shore and it shows a straight wall in the background with no skyline. At this point the cliff rises sheer 3,500 feet out of the sea.

Mexican Sea Elephants.

Norton spent several days on the island photographing the sea elephants under all conditions. They were taken entering the water, leaving the water, basking in the sun, playing, fighting, mothers nursing young, and frolicking in the water. Some of the close-up views were obtained within ten feet of the camera. There are individual portraits of every member of the herd including the babies.

Scientific authorities have told Mr. Norton that there are two varieties of sea elephants known to zoologists. There is one which is found in the arctic and antarctic regions and which is fairly common. The other, which bears the scientific name of Macrorhinus Angustirostris is now believed to be extinct except for these thirty-six surviving specimens.

Just what disposition he will make of the pictures has not been decided by the owner. If possible he wants the Smithsonian Institution to have a set and later he may make arrangements for their exhibition.

The accompanying still photograph of a pair of the animals does not do full justice to their trunks which are really longer than the fore-shortened perspective makes them appear. The bull in the foreground probably weighs nearly three tons and was one of the largest in the herd.

Brevities.

Richard V. Spencer has returned from the wars, and perhaps the directors of the Bison, the Broncho and the Keystone companies weren't glad to see their long lost scenario editor again. Spencer went to New York on a two weeks' vacation, but after he had looked at the bright lights awhile and had been given a square meal at the Photoplay Perpetrators' Function he forgot all about the poor directors back in Los Angeles who were compelled to supply their own scripts, and it took a month for him to remember his name and address. There was a delegation at the station to meet him when he came in and an automobile parade escorted him to the Edendale offices.

Clune's new Grand theater reduced its prices this week making a flat admission of ten cents to all parts of the house. At the same time Selig's three reel production of Monte Cristo went on and now nobody can tell what was responsible for the crowded houses.

POWELL.

"The Invaders" (Kay-Bee).

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS production ranks at the top of its kind, from an artistic point of view, and is a fine illustration of how constant and consistent work may succeed in spite of all difficulties. Most of the Indian pictures are very poor affairs, painfully lacking in truth of detail and without other significance than that of the lowest and cheapest photodrama presented. "The Invaders" presents an absorbing picture of dramatic conflict between the conquering and decadent forces, white and red, who clashed almost uninterrupted during the early history of our country.

One can form no idea from the illustrations here presented, where vision takes note of very little except the immediate appearance of things, of the motion picture itself, for it is a veritable whirlwind of physical activity. Motion-photography seems to have reached such a high degree of excellence in the product of this company that it is beginning in its detail to compare to the best of pictorial photography as applied to still life, with far greater emotional effects. Every painting, every etching, every still photograph of decided artistic merit has a message—it either addresses the heart or the mind so as to powerfully kindle the emotions or the imagination—hence it is reasonable to expect that when moving pictures are presented with the same comprehension of artistic value their appeal will be deeper and more lasting.

Scenes from "The Invaders," a Kay-Bee Feature.

The beautiful photography shown in this production is not only due to the right management of lights and sense of composition, but very largely to a high quality of workmanship in the factory. It is because of that masterly workmanship that the images are not vaguely suggested, that they become pictures of substance and vitality. The modest and quiet man back in the factory is contributing his full share towards making such beautiful pictures one of the most eloquent of human languages.

The story of "The Invaders" hinges upon a treaty made with the Sioux Indians which states that "in consideration of the above lands being ceded to the United States, the said Government will forbid the settlement of the remaining tribal lands of the Sioux nation," and some exceptionally fine ensembles portray the enactment of this treaty. Whether or not it is a true one is of no very great consequence, for many such were drawn.

The diplomatic relations of the United States Government and the Sioux began about a hundred years ago and the treaties related to original grants made to the tribes by English, French and Spanish Governments. They were intended more or less to end the incessant feuds which were gradually exterminating the Indians in the Middle West. The Sioux Indians had been constantly fighting with the Chippewas and were gradually being driven south by the latter, but there was no keeping peace between such ancient enemies.

For story purposes a party of white surveyors are shown as violating the treaty and thus rousing the Indians to a council of war. The Sioux chief visits the nearest military post and enters an angry protest. Unable to obtain satisfaction from the officer in command, he persuades the Cheyennes to join him in an uprising. The incident might have been true enough in those days when misconstructions and disputes about boundaries in unsurveyed forests and unexplored rivers were all too common, and when white men roamed uncontrolled in a territory occupied by a band of wild and ignorant savages.

The young men of the surveying corps are so confident of their ability to take care of themselves that they go out into the forests without the protection of a military escort, and one of them incurs the animosity of a Sioux brave by making love to an Indian girl called Sky Star. The Sioux brave is a preferred suitor for the hand of Sky Star, and it is he who directs the first movement made against "The Invaders." Sky Star dashes off alone on a horse to save the white men, and her perilous ride is the most thrilling feature of the entire story. In order to make a short cut to the surveyors she plunges down a precipitous bank on her horse, falls off and rolls to the bottom of a ravine. The horse picks himself up, but she lies unconscious while the Indians kill the white invaders of their tribal land.

While this slaughter is going on Sky Star recovers her senses, succeeds in mounting her horse and rides to the military post with news of the uprising. A detachment of troopers is sent out to check the advance of the Sioux, but the latter have communicated with their allies and the soldiers are surrounded by an overwhelming force after being ambushed. Some fine battle scenes are shown in this action, with comprehensive views of near and far distance characteristic of these productions. During the hot fight a group of riderless horses return to the post with the silent message of danger to follow.

Among the small body of soldiers remaining in the depleted post are the Colonel, a magnificent characterization not unlike that of General Custer, his daughter and her fiance, Lieutenant White. When Sky Star comes to give them information of the uprising she falls violently from her horse at the entrance of the barricade and is helped into the Colonel's headquarters, where she is cared for by his daughter.

The hottest kind of a fight now ensues between the defenders of the post and the great body of Indians surrounding it. The overwhelming number of redskins decides the Colonel to telegraph for aid, but the Indians anticipate his action by setting fire to the telegraph pole and the operator is unable to send his message. As a last resort Lieutenant White volunteers to ride to the next fort for aid. A demonstration is made to distract the attention of the Indians and the young officer escapes on his horse. While awaiting help the Colonel delays the fight under a flag of truce and claims to the Indian chief that he holds the latter's daughter as hostage, stating that if the attack is renewed she will be killed. The wily chief demands that his daughter be produced, but this is impossible on account of her condition and the fight is renewed.

One ending of the photodrama is now foreseen. Reinforcements arrive from a neighboring post and the entire body of Indians is driven away, but there is another conclusion. After the struggle is over, when the Colonel and his daughter and the heroic Lieutenant repair to the room where the Indian girl lies in badly injured condition they find that her spirit has gone to the Happy Hunting Grounds and the last scene dissolves in shadow. Thus the play comes to a definite and dramatic conclusion without any weak compromise, and artistic termination to an intense photodrama that is artistically satisfying from the beginning and one of the finest of its kind so far as craftsmanship is concerned.

The Picture in the Pulpit.

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

AN unusual number of letters has been coming in to us lately speaking of the lack of films suitable for the use of clergymen and religious workers, the burden of the cry being that there are too few dramatic photoplays that tell a good, clean story with a strong underlying moral and that the tendency at present is towards polite melodrama. To some extent this criticism is just. There are not enough dramatic photoplays of the character mentioned and the present tendency does seem to be toward quite a melodramatic tinge of plot, but there are more stories than is generally known that are excellent for the purpose of religious and moral teaching and as, with the constantly increasing number of clergymen and others starting in on this kind of work, the exhibitor and exchange man may be beset by complaints of this kind, we give below a list of some of the best photoplays that have been released during July, August and September, classified, roughly, according to their moral aspects. The list does not pretend to be a complete one and is purposely restricted to those photoplays that we have seen ourselves or have reason to know have been used for the purposes indicated, but for this very reason it is all the more to be depended on.

Children's Stories.

"The Barefoot Boy" (Kalem)' suggested by Whittier's poem and a good story on the social relations of children to each other. "The Little Wanderer" (Kalem), duties of parents and stepparents to children. "The Magic Wand" (Essanay), filial devotion.

Biblical Stories.

"The Death of Saul" (C. G. P. C.). "A Prince of Israel" (C. G. P. C.), rebellion of Absalom. "The Church Across the Way" (Vitagraph), the mourners' beatitude.

Moral Theology: Ethics.

"The Voice of Conscience" (Essanay), the power of conscience and the duty of following its dictates. "Her Hour of Triumph" (Essanay), and "At the Eleventh Hour" (Vitagraph), pride and vanity and their consequences, suggested by Maupassant's "Necklace." "A Child's Remorse" (Biograph), sin of anger in children and the example set them by parents. "The House of His Master" (Selig), intemperance. "The Grandfather" (Edison), fifth commandment: duties of children to parents. "The Black Sheep" (Vitagraph), same. "Her Adopted Father" (Essanay), duty of husband and wife. "The House of His Master" (Selig), same. "Vultures and Doves" (Vitagraph), evils of speculation. "The House of His Master" (Selig), duties of masters and servants. "A Child's Devotion" (Lubin), filial love.

The Church and its Services.

"The Easter Celebration at Jerusalem (1912)" (Kalem), actual pictures of the keeping of Easter by the Christians.

Religious Associations and Institutions.

"Opening of the Y. M. C. A. Playground at Lynchburg, Va., 1912" (Edison).

Church History.

"The Martyrs" (C. G. P. C.), story of the early persecutions. "Anona's Baptism" (Pathe), based on a tale of the Jesuit missionaries in the northwest of Canada in the seventeenth century.

Scenes of Bible Lands.

"From Jerusalem to the Dead Sea" (Kalem). "The Ancient Port of Jaffa" (Kalem). "Palestine" (Kalem).

Scenes in Missionary Fields.

"Across the Broad Pacific" (Essanay), China, Japan and the Philippines. "Picturesque Darjeeling, India" (Edison). "Benares and Agra, India" (Edison). "Simla, One of the Hill Towns of India" (Edison).

All of the above are releases of the licensed manufacturers. The independent manufacturers are given below. Their list is much shorter than the other, but it contains at least one very notably good film, namely, Thanhouser's "But the greatest of these is Charity."

Biblical Stories.

"The Holy City" (Eclair), a two-real dramatization of Christ's ministry, based on one of the translations of the "Rhythm of S. Bernard, of Clairvaulx."

Moral Theology: Ethics.

"The Actress Pulls the Strings" (Eclair), courtesy. "The Voice of Conscience" (Thanhouser), the power of conscience and duty of minding it. "But the greatest of these is Charity" (Thanhouser), a story built around the dedication of St. Joséph's parochial school, New Rochelle, N. Y., by Cardinal Farley, and teaching in a very forcible manner the truth of St. Paul's statement which is taken for the title.

Church History.

"Androclus and the Lion" (Gaumont), a story of the early persecutions.

Scenes in Biblical Lands.

"Scenes of Luxor and Thebes in Egypt" (Eclair). "A Desert Trip" (Eclair). "Egyptian Ruins" (Eclair).

Scenes in Missionary Fields.

"Through China" (Eclair). "Benares, the Sacred City" (Ambrosio).

The foregoing list is by no means a poor showing, although we wish as do many others, that it was better. It is, however, only a question of time before the manufacturers will find it to their advantage to cater regularly to this class of film user and it was only to-day that we learned from Mrs. Dolese of the educational department of the General Film Company that the exchanges generally are beginning to keep track of educationals and educational photoplays as the demand for them is constantly increasing.

Meanwhile, as a practical suggestion to those who need photoplays of this religious and semi-religious character, we would advise that they read carefully each week the synopses, comments and manufacturers' advance notes that are published in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, that they keep in touch with the exhibitors in their town and see as many of these photoplays as they conveniently can, and lastly that they keep some sort of classified index of such films as seem to them to point out evangelistic and religious truth or have a strong moral. We are quite well aware that a clergyman's life is a very busy one and, as we have already such a list for our own use which we keep up to date, we shall be very glad to help out in any way we can any one who will write us what he wants and sends us a stamped and self-addressed envelope for the reply. If the requests come in in sufficient quantity to make the replies of general interest we shall be very glad to publish further lists of suitable films on various subjects in THE WORLD.

Missions and Moving Pictures.

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

THRU the courtesy of the Edison company, the writer was enabled to give a most interesting and successful demonstration of the value and use of moving pictures in the work and study of missions to the third annual council of the second missionary department of the Protestant Episcopal Church, which met in Buffalo, New York, October 22 to 24, last. An accurate estimate of the results that will come of this demonstration cannot yet be made, but some idea of its success and importance as a landmark in the educational and religious use of the moving picture is indicated by the fact that at least one, probably two of the most influential and important parishes of the church in New York City are already making plans to instal a complete Edison equipment, that one of the largest parishes in Buffalo is doing the same, that one of the missionary bishops present is seriously considering the installing of machines in the parishes and missions of his jurisdiction because, as he says, "I need them to educate my people," and last, tho not least by the enthusiastic reception and thoughtful expressions of appreciation of the value of the pictures in religious work by every one at the council.

To show the importance of this demonstration to those who are not familiar with the organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church it may perhaps be well to state that the church has a constitution similar to that of the United States. It is composed of a certain number of dioceses and missionary jurisdictions, corresponding to the states of the union, each governing itself and doing its own work in its own way, but all of them subject to the control of a central legislative body known as the General Convention which is constituted like the federal congress and is made up of two houses, one comprising all the bishops of the dioceses and jurisdictions and corresponding to the United States Senate, the other formed of a certain number of clergymen and laymen chosen from each diocese and corresponding to the house of representatives. The dioceses are self supporting and the missionary jurisdictions are financed by the General Board of Missions, a corporate body, whose members are chosen by the General Convention. In order to facilitate the work of this board, the dioceses and jurisdictions are grouped into eight missionary departments, and the second of these departments, which has just held its council at Buffalo, comprises the eight dioceses in the states of New York and New Jersey and the missionary jurisdiction of Porto Rico.

The councils of these departments, which meet annually, are not legislative, but deliberative. Their business is to hear and consider reports from the General Board of Missions as to the work in the mission field and also reports from the different dioceses and jurisdictions of the departments as to how their mission work is carried on, their successes, failures, difficulties, encouragements, etc, and finally to propose and recommend ways and means and methods for making the missionary work and education more effective. For example, the council of the second missionary department in Buffalo, not only considered such general questions as the opportunity afforded by the present conditions in the east and in Mexico and the relation of Christian citizenship to missions, but also took up two entire sessions discussing effective methods of stimulating missionary interest and the ways and means of making the study of missions interesting and definite in the Sunday-school and thru mission study classes. Consequently, it can easily be seen how important and far reaching in its consequences a successful demonstration of the use of moving pictures in Sunday-school and mission study work might be, not only as a means of instructing church members as to what is going on in the mission field and the need for mission work, but also as an instrument in doing the mission work itself. This was amply shown and realized in the present instance.

The opportunity for demonstrating this in a practical way occured to me when I received my invitation to the council, about a week before the date of opening, and altho the time for preparation was very short and the program of the sessions already printed and distributed, I determined to make the effort and see what could be done. After consulting several members of the council, I went to Mr. John Pelzer of the Edison company, and on my telling him what I wished to do he at once offered me the loan of his best demonstrator and a complete projecting outfit and placed them at my disposal for the entire time of the council. I then rented from the educational department of the General Film Company, at the regular rates, a number of films, namely, "Holy Fires and the Easter Celebration at Jerusalem" (Kalem), "Palestine" (Kalem), "From Jerusalem to the Dead Sea" (Kalem), "Cashmere, the Chief Health Resort of India" (Edison) and "Anona's Baptism" (Pathe), and went to Buffalo which I reached Tuesday morning.

Meanwhile, Mr. Walter W. Evans, Jr., the Edison company's demonstrator, who had arrived in Buffalo the day before had found out and complied with the fire and police regulations as to the exhibiting of the pictures, and had procured the requisite asbestos booth. Before continuing, it is only fair to say that much of the success of the demonstration was due to the unflagging zeal and efforts of Mr. Evans, not only in putting up and operating his machine, but also for his many valuable suggestions, his continued presence at all sessions of the council and his unfailing readiness to answer questions and make explanations to any and all during the whole time. Last, but not least should be reckoned the entertainment which he gave to the children of the parish where the council was held, which will be referred to again later.

The rector of the parish, where the council met, proved an enthusiastic collaborator. He immediately gave his permission for the setting up of the booth and the machine in the rear of the assembly hall of the parish house, and while Mr. Evans and I put them up and made the electrical connections, which took us until midnight, he arranged with the president and secretary of the council for an opportunity for the giving of the demonstration. The president, and the secretary of the council both of whom have known and appreciated the value of the pictures for some time, were equally enthusiastic, and at the close of the first morning session, the latter announced and introduced the first running of the pictures by a short, appreciative speech.

The exhibition was begun at once by the showing of Edison's "Cashmere" followed by the three Kalem pictures, and at the close of the afternoon session was continued with "Anona's Baptism" and Edison's "Calcutta," the latter loaned for the purpose by the General Film company's exchange in Buffalo, which most courteously placed at our disposal, free of charge, not only this but also Edison's "Simla," and the children's reels that Mr. Evans used in his entertainment of the young people of the parish, on the next evening, after the council had closed, besides offering for our use in addition, any reels that we might desire from their stock. As several members of the council who had been in Palestine requested it, the Kalem reels were run a second time.

The reels were run without comment, except from the spectators, who freely expressed their opinions, all of which were favorable, and without the accompaniment of any formal address. During the running of Edison's "Cashmere" the applause and appreciative remarks were very frequent and, as the various Kalem scenes in the Holy Land appeared, several clergymen who had been there kept up a running and audible commentary that amounted almost to an impromptu lecture. In estimating the value of this testimony to the worth of the pictures we must remember that the spectators were for the most part all acquainted with each other and that the atmosphere and environment were rather those of a family entertainment than of a formal amusement. Consequently there was more freedom of expression and many remarks and discussions were overheard not only extolling the pictures but as to the various ways and methods of using them in missionary work and education.

It was this atmosphere of informality that made us omit all set speeches in connection with the running of the pictures and instead spend the time between the exhibitions in conversational discussion and exposition with everyone who might be interested. The results more than justified our expectations, as Mr. Evans and I were both of us kept busy almost all of the time during and between the sessions of the council in talking to those who were interested and wanted to know more about the subject, and we were thus able to meet more effectively the particular difficulties and needs of individuals than would have been at all possible by means of general statements and a few chosen examples, such as must have been used in a formal address.

In only one instance did we hear an adverse opinion and that came from a man who declined to view the pictures because he said they "made his eyes water." On the other hand, the interest in and the appreciation and recognition of the value of the pictures as an instrument in teaching missions and in doing mission work was practically unanimous. The discussions were confined almost entirely to ways and means of utilizing them and to the practical questions of installing and using the machines and the special problems that would arise in doing this in individual cases. The only objection raised was that at present there were not enough pictures of missionary subjects available, and that the scenics and descriptives were rather too sketchy and fragmentary to be successfully used in any extended course of teaching. We answered this objection by pointing out that there was already a fairly good collection of subjects that could be used in illustrating the manners and customs of the peoples among whom the various missions were established, and that it was probable that as soon as a sufficient demand was created for releases dealing with the missionary activities of those countries they would be supplied in the same way that the different institutional works of this country were now being produced in response to the demand of the social service associations who used them.

The making of such a series is a question that it may be well worth the while of the manufacturers to consider. The missionaries themselves would be only too glad to render every aid they could in the taking of the pictures, the interest of those whose pennies and nickels and dimes go to support the missions would be immeasurably increased by seeing the actual work for which they are paying, while the subjects themselves should certainly be fully as interesting general releases as many of the educationals we are now getting. And last, though not least, it looks very much as if this demonstration in Buffalo marks the beginning of a demand that is going to become more and more insistent and extensive every day and that will not be satisfied until it is supplied.

A NEW LUBIN SCIENTIFIC FILM.

As is well known the Lubin Company has always been foremost in promoting the cause of science, especially in the field of medicine. Lovers of the science therefore, both lay as well as professional, will be very glad to learn that the company is now turning the camera on one of the most interesting and practical topics in the province of bacteriology, namely, the work of the laboratory in Philadelphia where the various serums for the prevention and cure of different diseases are being compounded. The film will show not only the actual processes of extracting and compounding the different serums used in the prevention of smallpox, scarlet fever, spinal meningitis, rabies, etc., but it will also portray the treatment to which calves, horses and other animals are subjected before the extraction of the serum from their blood. We have not yet heard whether the film is to be one of the company's general releases or not, but we hope that it will be so, as it is the kind of a picture to be not only instructive but highly interesting as well to every one.

SHOWS PICTURES EXCLUSIVELY.

The Alhambra Theater, of St. Paul, Minn., which at one time played to vaudeville and moving pictures, canceled all vaudeville engagements and is now playing to moving pictures only. A complete change of program will be made on Sundays, Tuesdays and Thursdays. A five-piece orchestra and a pipe-organ will furnish the musical accompaniment to the pictures.

"Siegfried"

A Magnificent Three Reel Special from the German Hero Story by Ambrosio.

Siegfried is to us what Achilles was to the Greeks and almost as Aeneas to the Romans. All that is most glorious in us, except what we have taken from Christianity, Siegfried is. Things that our hearts most cherish, that most quickly excite our imaginations Siegfried stands for. And although stories of him are now no longer sung by fire sides as once they were, nearly everyone knows something about him. Wagner's operas have been sung to so many and have been described even in newspapers to so many more that the announcement of this Ambrosio special offering will surely awake anticipation in a host of spectators. People will want to see this story pictured in the freedom of the open and against such backgrounds as European camera men can find. For, like all epics, its action transpired in the open places for the most part.

The difficulties of illustrating the Siegfried story are immense. Costumes, of course, are easy to find; they are being used in the operas. And the backgrounds offer no especial obstacle. The trouble lies in preparing the scenario and particularly in finding perfect players to set forth these ideal types. Crimhielde, its lonely heroine, was as beautiful as Helen of Troy, more beautiful, to face it squarely, than any woman except those only who, like Eve, live wholly in poetry. No living woman would satisfy everyone in this part. To fill the male parts is somewhat easier.

In approaching the scenario problem, there are at least two methods of attacq. One is to accent the stirring action; but this probably can only be done at the expense of its poetry. The alternative is to accent the story's atmosphere. This seems the wiser way and the Ambrosio producer has followed it. He has made a spectacle, stirring on account of its bigness rather than its sweep. The result is not a torrential story of passion so much as a poetic illustration; it isn't flung at one but is quietly spread out. Spectators will remember it best for its great scenes.

The opening of the picture is an interior, the Niblung castle, ancestral home of Siegfried. We see the old king, his father at a table with many of his roughly armed retainers around him, in furry skins with iron-studded belts and corselets of hide covered with iron plates. The hero enters, salutes his father and converses with a harper who sings of Crimhilde, with whom, sight unseen, Siegfried falls in love. The following scenes show his setting out for the court of the lady's brother, Gunther, the reception, the views of the lonely Crimhilde and the taking up of the adventures which Gunther lays out for him before he can win her. Beautiful, indeed, is the scene through which the heroic Norseman, in gold-winged helmet, rides toward his first adventure, the freeing of Mime from the nymphs, another poetic picture. Finely imaginative also is the forge scene where Mime makes Siegfried's sword, with which he soon frees Brunhilde from the spell of fire.

The second act opens with the bringing of Brunhilde to Gunther. Immense interiors are the chief sets for this act and, with the almost innumerable host of players that appear, make magnificent scenes. The action in this act moves slowly. It stands on its stateliness. The time consumed in merely moving the retainers is considerable; but their marching is beautiful, and the action, what there is of it, is of tense dramatic quality. The awakening of jealousy in Brunhilde and her conspiracy with Hagen, the story's villain, find in these scenes a fitting background.

The third act, except that Crimhilde's avenging army takes very long to pass, moves speedily; it sweeps us quickly into the tragedy and the Nemesis that follows. Siegfried is slain and the two conspirators take refuge in Burgundy where Crimhilde, with an immense horde, finds them. The Burgundians are overcome and their castle burned. These are very good scenes. The vengeance of Crimhilde closes the picture.

WHERE TO GET THE BEST PICTURES.

The largest and best pictures before the world to-day are from the largest and best books. This statement precludes all argument and is a strong guide for future productions. All big and good films are from big and good books written by big and good men.

On the other side it is equally true to say that everything little, unimportant and often insignificant, has come from sources equally small and limited. There is a sense in which both kinds are required—"It takes all kinds to make a world." Nevertheless, whichever predominates, it must necessarily follow that public taste and opinion will also follow.

Happily for the public good and the all-'round elevation of the public opinion, the better and best-class pictures are in the ascendant. The success of the most recent pictures shows that educational and high-class pictures are at once the most acceptable, most popular and in turn most profitable to the makers. When we remember the books used we find them a more than sufficient guarantee for good. As in literature, so in pictures, the Bible leads. More subjects are taken from the Bible than from any other one book. Upwards of fifty different biblical pictures are now standardized in cinematography. No other book presents more than two or three subjects. The list, however, contains Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," Shakespeare, Scott, Dickens and Dante abroad; while Irving, Longfellow and Beecher Stowe lead among America's authors, these names being given solely to show the type of authors whose works are receiving additional immortality through the illustrating film.

For the purpose of inspiring and encouraging the ability of the literary lights of the day, good scenarios of any subject are acceptable to all manufacturers, but they must be "good." Public taste has been most tremendously cultivated during the last twelve or eighteen months. Two years ago almost any picture was acceptable; people went to see pictures. To-day, however, the program and advertisements are scanned, and only subjects according to the standard described above are acceptable. The great changes which have occurred are only indications of the continual developments which await the progress of cinematography. The future has often been ideally and theoretically portrayed on these pages; the practical fulfilment is now being rapidly experienced, all pointing to a larger field ahead.

It is well known to all film manufacturers where to get the best picture subjects; the source and the demand are alike agreed upon; it only waits for the supply to continue more thoroughly than ever to bring the two together.

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

IN a panic that was started during the progress of a picture show on Grand Street, several women were injured, fortunately none of them seriously, by being trampled upon. The affair was started by two men fighting and a hysterical woman yelling "Fire" The management of the place has been very unjustly criticised by a reader of a newspaper report of the occurrence which, it is surprising to say, had the facts of the case pretty nearly correct. The management was criticised for allowing in the place people of a class that bring about such results, but the actual occurrences were such that there was absolutely no excuse for the authorities to take any action other than seek the arrest of the men who engaged in the fight. Such occurrences may be looked for at almost any place no matter how well regulated. Some men have their hats in the ring at all times and an accidental stepping on their corns will start them going like powder touched off by a spark. What follows cannot be controlled because it is impossible to keep out the hysterically-inclined people who have no control over themselves. There is but one remedy. Inaugurate a movement to induce such people to remain away from public gatherings, and this can only be done by their immediate families.

The case referred to brings to mind a recent occurrence in a crowded picture house downtown which may convey a valuable tip. A fan attached to a side wall in the gallery suddenly blazed up, on account of a short circuit. It was not observed by the people in the lower part of the house and the operator continued the show as if nothing had happened, although the fan was located only a short distance from his booth. Murmurs, portending what has been the rule on such occasions, swept through the gallery with the first flash from the burning fan, but a shout from the special officer, "Keep order there!" had a quieting effect. Two women who had been watching the blaze speechlessly suddenly sprang to their feet. It seemed that they were trying to cry out before making a dash, which undoubtedly would have followed the next instant had not a man who was seated between them jumped to his feet and spread out his arms in such a way as to force both women back to their seats, at the same time telling them in a severe undertone, "Sit there, or I'll knock your blocks off!" His language was by no means elegant, but it was very opportune. In a few moments the blaze at the fan burned out and the show was continued to the "Good night." The incident was a remarkable one considering the character of the place and its patrons. There was but one narrow stairway leading from the crowded gallery and a disaster would certainly have followed an audible alarm. It illustrated strikingly what a couple of cool-headed men may do on such occasions. Quite in contrast with another incident witnessed: A woman on the main floor of a house fainted, having been overcome by the heat. Her friends were taking her from the seat when the usher thoughtlessly, but with good intent, exclaimed in a voice that was heard in other parts of the house, "This way out; now don't get excited!" his remarks being addressed to both the friends of the woman and curious people in nearby seats. Those seated nearer the screen, however, scented danger and there was a rush, in which a panic was barely averted. The right words and action in the right place are needed on all occasions of this kind and ushers and special officers who can act accordingly become valuable.

It would be unfair to leave subjects of this character without commending, to some extent, the operators, piano players, singers and others who are active on the scene. They perform good service when they "Keep her going," especially the operator. His position, to my mind, is very much like the wireless man when he sticks to his post on the threatened vessel. The positions and chances are probably not identical in point of true heroism, but the aims and ends are none the less praiseworthy.

Speaking of operators recalls a comment made on a recent statement in this column that few operators make successful managers. It has been my privilege to have intimate dealings with a large number of operator-managers and the statement was based upon that experience. Some operators met with proved excellent managers, but almost invariably they were men who had experience in the show business before they took up operating projecting machines. Several of these men have since given up operating altogether and hold responsible positions with leading Broadway houses, traveling companies and prominent theaters in other large cities. They were but a handful of scores of men I met and dealt with. The less fortunate were intelligent and possessed business ability, but they lacked some of the essential qualities that brought success to the others. Take one of them as a sample. His case will bring out the point. He was one of the best operators I ever met: qualified to the letter in every branch and remarkably resourceful. He would give results when it seemed conditions made it absolutely impossible to attain them. He was known to jump into towns where only trolley juice was at his disposal and give good results, although obliged to run his wires through barrels of water and resorting to other emergencies on short notice, even to climbing a pole and repairing a transformer that had been put out of commission by a thunder storm. He was under a manager then and it was one of the best picture shows on the road. Deciding to have his own show, after several years' experience with the one just referred to, he started from New York with an assistant manager and first-class outfit and operator. His program consisted of the greatest collection of pictures known to that time. It was the cream of foreign and domestic make. Everything was planned for success and he went over the leading circuits with flying colors. Eventually differences arose that caused the assistant manager to retire and the manager assumed full charge of the show with most unsatisfactory results. He was an able man as an operator, but he did not carry his power of resource with him as a manager, and his lack of tact and foresight made him unpopular with the circuits.

Some of the exhibitors are complaining that the political campaign has put a dent in their box office receipts. Cheer up, old pals! It was always thus in political campaigns, especially presidential contests. The candidates will soon stop running and then the cash boxes will take on a healthy complexion again. Meantime take consolation in the knowledge that the big fish are not taking the business from you. The prices of the Century Theater that ranged from $50 to $2.50 have been cut down to $25 to $1.50, although the attraction at the house is declared by a famous critic to be "superior to anything of the kind I ever saw." Mr. Tyler, the lessee of the house, says "It looks very much as if the increased cost of living were exercising a very big influence in theatrical affairs. As the regular prices of the picture houses are in accordance with the spirit of the times and the programs meet the requirements and tastes of the amusement public the exhibitors should not lose heart over a temporary drop in receipts.

I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Nicholas Power, of the Nicholas Power Company, the other day. His appearance indicates that his recent trip to Europe was a very enjoyable one. His twinkling eyes, rosy cheeks and the well-trimmed beard, that allows enough of his genial smile to be seen to make one feel all the cordiality extended, create a desire to have frequent meetings with him. He is one of the most unchangeable men in the business. The greeting to old friends is given as heartily as in the days—well, before he became a magnate. Mr. Power says he was surprised to find in distant Russia such an extended use of American films and machines. By the way, the N. Power Company will soon put a new machine on the market. It is claimed it will be perfect in every detail.

The fire marshal of New York State has recommended public school courses in fire prevention. The New York World says they might prove interesting to the boy pupils, but says there is a tendency to teach school children too many things. It thinks fire-drills sufficient. Motion pictures would fill the bill to a nicety. The course in film shape would be still more interesting, both to boys and girls, and the same end could be attained by weekly or semi-weekly exhibitions without imposing additional mental work upon the pupils. Couple with the fire marshal's suggestion those of Prof. Heger, of Brussels, for the establishment of cinematographic demonstrations before classes. He has proved the utility of the cinematograph in the teaching of the sciences, especially in displaying, on a large scale, things otherwise observable only under a microscope, that a central cinematograph institute is contemplated. We should be up with the times and no more practical and important subject than the prevention and handling of fires can be selected for a start.

Next month several educational films, accompanied by lectures of teachers, will be exhibited before the principals of the public schools of Berlin. Any American firms which intend to have their films shown before the principals' convention may communicate with Dr. Wolter, in care of the Erste Internationale Film-Zeitung.

Music for the Picture

BY CLARENCE E. SINN

FROM "T. B.," Walla Walla, Wash.—"The only objection I have to find with the music for the picture department is that more musicians do not contribute. Most of us have different opinions as to how pictures should be played and it does us good to know what others think. In my opinion, a person is obliged to be able to improvise in order to be a real success in our profession, and furthermore I think that by hard study improvising may be acquired. If a musician has a fair idea of harmony and musical form and is acquainted with the popular grand operas and composers he can imitate them to a certain extent, even if he has no originality. Playing for the pictures is certainly an art entirely by itself and those who can improvise naturally are fortunate. If you have room for this I will write more next time."

This department welcomes the different opinions of the many engaged in playing to the pictures. It is through comparing the experience of others with our own that we grow—by assimilating other ideas that we develop; one must be self-opinionated, indeed, who can not learn something of value from another's methods, even if he does not always agree with them. The editor of this department does not agree with the contributors who maintain that a picture player "must be born and cannot be made." It is conceded, of course, that one must have a certain amount of talent to succeed in anything; also that playing a musical instrument is largely mechanical. But a talent must be trained along certain accepted lines to produce the best results and this training is also mechanical. Webster defines art as "the disposition or modification of things by human skill to answer the purpose intended: a system of rules serving to facilitate the performance of certain actions—skill, dexterity, or the power of performing certain actions, acquired by experience, study or observation."

Playing for the pictures is an art—acquired by experience, study and observation, to be obtained only in actual work before the screen. They who cannot improvise must memorize, but most players can improvise to some extent, even if it is nothing more than a succession of chords connecting one number to the next. One does not need to be a great composer to improvise passably for the picture, and as our correspondent says, "a fair knowledge of harmony and musical form, together with an acquaintance with popular grand operas and composers," he can at least imitate them.

Manager W. Giebig, Crystal Amusement Co., Houston, Texas, writes: "Our Mr. Arthur Lange, pianist (performing on the 'Choralcello'), submits the enclosed program, which he used for Thanhouser's 'Undine.' The program for 'Lucille,' as submitted by Mr. Charles Offenberg in MOVING PICTURE WORLD, September 30th, is identical with one used by Mr. Lange."

MUSICAL PROGRAM FOR "UNDINE."

(Arranged by Mr. Arthur Lange, Crystal Theater, Houston, Tex.)

PART I.

1. Water Nymph (Nevin); as Undine and maidens swim about rocks.
2. Salut de Amour (Elgar). Undine watches the lovers.
3. Falling Waters (Truax). Spirit of the Brook.
4. Neutral Waltz. As she meets her foster father at sunset.
5. Le Secret (Gautier). As knight wagers with Lady Berthalda.
6. Ghost Dance. As Huldbrand sets out.
7. Ah! So Pure (Martha). "For Many Days the Knight Lingers."
8. Liebestraum (Liszt). The consent is granted.
9. Laces and Graces (Bratton). As Huldbrand leads Undine to the castle.

PART II.

1. Bridal Chorus (Lohengrin). The happy pair proceed to their home.
2. The Fountain (Bohm). Spirit of the Brook rises to bless them.
3. Charme d'Amour (Kendall). Lady Berthalda lavishes her attentions on Huldbrand.
4. Agitato. Spirit of the Brook in a rage.
5. Waltz Lento. In a great boat Undine, Berthalda and Huldbrand set out.
6. Plaintive, until Undine returns to Old Neptune.
7. "My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice" (Saint Saens). Betrothal of Berthalda and Huldbrand.
8. Morning Mood (Grieg). Undine prepares for a journey.
9. Spring Song (Mendelssohn). In the rose garden.
10. Wedding March (Mendelssohn). Marriage procession; wedding of Huldbrand and Berthalda.
11. Largo (Handel). As Huldbrand falls dead.
12. Funeral dirge (Chopin). Procession carries Huldbrand to tomb.
13. Consolation (plaintive), till end of picture.

Mr. Lange has given us a fine program for this beautiful picture, and well worth careful examination. Am sorry I did not receive it sooner, but hope Mr. Lange will favor us again in the near future.

A Program for "As You Like It."

From H. R. Seeman, leader of orchestra, Lafayette Theater, New Orleans, La., comes the following:

"I enclose a synopsis of my musical program for the Vitagraph release, 'As You Like It.' The management spared no expense in making this the biggest feature in the history of the photodrama here. Securing from nearby woods trees, palms, leaves and shrubbery, etc., we decorated the stage to represent the Forest of Arden, moving the orchestra upon the stage, the orchestra pit being deserted for palms and beautiful flowers of all descriptions, this move proving very effective. Chimes were used as a signal for curtain which rises, showing the two principal characters, Rosalind and Orlando, with an appropriate recitation from Shakespeare, accompanied by Mendelssohn's 'Spring-Song.' This was followed by picture without title.

"I opened with selection from "Maritana," using the first and second movements maestoso and andante for death scene, continuing selection until title for wrestling match: 'Contest Starts.' Then into vivace movement until Orlando throws wrestler, taking up selection again at allegretto movement until finish, then 'Idilio' (by Theo. Lack), until title: 'The Jester Agrees to Go as Escort'; then 'Sizilietta' (by F. V. Blon), until title for recitation of 'Seven Ages'; then 'Swan' (by Saint-Saens), until over. Then 'Sous la Feuillee' (Under the Leaves), by F. Thome, until title, 'Orlando Who Has Never Forgiven Rosalind'; then Mendelssohn's Spring Song, until title, 'By Two O'clock I Will Be with Thee Again'; then 'A la Bien Aimee' (by Edouard Shutt), stopping at title, 'Orlando Saves the Life of His Brother'; then Agitato No. 13, from dramatic music series, by Theo. Bendix; then 'A la Bien Aimee,' again until title, 'Phoebe's Letter Is Delivered'; then 'Serenade Les Millions d'Arlequin' (R. Drigo), until title, 'Rosalind Teaches Orlando How to Make Love'; 'Humoresque,' by Dvorak until title, 'Rosalind Obtains Permission to Give Her Hand'; then 'Pan,' pastorale (by Godard), until 'Prepared to Make the Duke'; then 'Joy of Living' (Nicolo Celega), until Duke joins hands of Rosalind and Orlando; then 'Wedding March' (Lohengrin), short, into 'Joy of Living'; again until title, 'Duke Frederick Recalls His Brother, etc.'; then grand march from 'Aida,' till finish of picture. The screen arising immediately upon a beautiful set tableau with five characters.

"Of the Vitagraph Company's musical suggestions I find that few are in keeping with the action of the picture and several numbers they mention are altogether too modern—such as 'My Hero' (from Chocolate Soldier) and a few other numbers recently made popular. The overture 'William Tell' cannot be used in any part of the picture. Names of several members like 'Wanderers' Song' (Schubert), 'Long Weary Day,' etc., are appropriate, but the scenes are too short to do justice to them, as the rhythm is not in keeping with the changes. I believe where one has a chance to use good numbers it is an injustice to the music as well as the picture to stop and play a strain of a song for a scene that lasts about 60 seconds. Any one familiar with 'Idilio,' 'Humoresque,' 'Drigo's Serenade,' 'A la Bien Aimee,' 'Swan,' 'Pan Pastorale,' and Blon's 'Sizilietta' can readily imagine them being suited to Arden and Arcadia scenes, and is sure to hold the attention of his listeners."

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

The Monte Cristo Sheets.

THE Selig Company sends out material for Monte Cristo with the usual Selig-Twist thoroughness, and the material cannot but be helpful to the manager, but we would like to suggest to Mr. Twist that the next time he prepares the campaign for the big stuff that the Diamond-S is famous for, that he mortise the advertising layout cuts so that the name of the theater may be set inside the border and not below it. We like the thoroughness with which the campaign is prepared for the manager and we think it materially helps the exchange as well as the manager since no live manager will let Monte Cristo or any other Selig get by him when he has the ready made advertising to his hand. We think that other manufacturers on both sides of the license fence could profit by a study of these special envelopes that come from the House of Selig in advance of the big release. Most companies contribute some material, but no other house makes its preparations with the same thoroughness nor gauges the exhibitors' wants so exactly.

From a popular point of view Monte Cristo is a more important release than the Coming of Columbus, though the papers will not use the material as freely, and so there is no full page mat such as was prepared for the discovery film. Otherwise the set is as complete and supplies all the material that the exhibitor can need.

Have you told the local librarians that the subject is coming? It may interest them, since all live libraries are eager to push the distribution of good literature, and most of them will permit the manager to post a neat card calling attention to the subject.

Wish It Was Here.

B. Nichols, of the M. P. Sales Co., London, sends us some copies of the London Evening News, in which some two or three columns in each are devoted to the pictures. There is an elaborate story for Miss Gene Gauntier on "From the Manger to the Cross," and items for Kalem and other Nichols brands as well as material from the other companies.

Did you ever try to interest your local editor in running a column on Saturday or Sunday? Perhaps there are others in town who will also benefit. Get them to help agitate the question and if they won't, figure it out that even if they do get some of the benefit you'll get enough for yourself to make it worth your while. Be something more than the man who opens and shuts the door of a picture theater. If there is something doing in your town, declare in. If there is nothing—start something. If every picture theater manager did his share of the work we would have the photoplay level with the dramatic theater inside of a year. No matter how much you may help the other fellow think only of the good you will be doing your own house. Keep after the papers, the ministers, the teachers, and the welfare of the people. There is not a week that something is not issued that will interest one of these four classes. Is it brought to their attention? If it isn't make it YOUR duty and they'll come to regard you as the motion picture authority of your town, while the other chap oversleeps. The picture business in your town is what you make it. Make it good.

Got Out Their Own Sheet.

What is truly advertising for exhibitors comes from Dallas, Texas, where the Consolidated Film and Supply Company got out a special sheet each day of the recent convention in that city of the Texas Exhibitors' League. It's a bit noisy in tone, but it is lively and readable, and there is more exhibitor than exchange in the columns, which is not always the case in these issues. The Consolidated realized that the best thing to do was to play to the exhibitor and contented itself with a minimum of advertising and a maximum of effect. It takes a little nerve to keep yourself out of your own paper—but it pays.

Still at Stories.

The Princess Theater, Provo, Utah, seems to find that it pays to run a story in the daily paper and goes to some pains to supply the local sheet with material from the Motion Picture Story Magazine. In the last issue they got a front page cut and almost a page of reading matter to back up a quarter page advertisement. Where the paper runs a daily or weekly story there is no reason why you cannot get the sheet to run the story of some film you are going to have. It will be good advertising for you and at the same time it helps the paper along. Take the proposition to your editor, if you live in a small town, and see what he thinks of it. We think that if you send a couple of stamps to the Provo Herald, asking for a back number with one of the stories in, you'll have something to show your editor that will be convincing.

Wants a Program.

Walter H. Brooks, of the Pastime Theater, Canton, Pa., writes that he is going to open a new house and asks for suggestions as to a suitable program. He regularly runs two reels of licensed stuff, but wants to spread a little for the new theater, which has a capacity of 350 against 200 in the old, and thinks that he can swell the program a little. He adds that Indian subjects are not popular and that the audience is able to appreciate the best. Mr. Brooks doesn't say very clearly whether he means a regular program for the new house or that for the opening night, so we'll answer both questions.

For a formal opening we think we would get one of the three reel specials even if it took off the profits for a week. The main thing in a new house is to get the old people coming to the new location and to coax others in. This can best be done with some special feature liberally boomed. Monte Cristo is a good new offering and there is a lot of press matter to be had that will help, but almost any of the specials listed by the General Film Company will make good. If the bank account can stand the strain we think we would whoop things up to the limit and have a whole week of special features. We certainly would have a special for the opening night, and we would make a lot of noise the week beforehand. We would have a small celebration at the old house the last night with Auld Lang Syne for a playout number, and then a bigger celebration for the opening of the new place with a three or four-piece band and all the trimmings with the editor of the local papers, the town dignitaries, and others in conspicuous seats, and the special film.

For a regular program we would have two subjects as up-to-date as we could afford, and a commercial. Note down the big things you do not get at the time of issue, and ask the exchange for them, paying slightly more than the commercial price to get them early. If you plan your campaign properly your commercials will sometimes be more of a feature than the new runs, for you can make a better selection.

A Pocket Card.

Mr. Brooks also sends a three-day program on a 3 by 5¼ card with rounded edges and writes that he finds that these are more likely to be preserved than a more bulky publication since it can go into the vest pocket. The back of the card is taken by a confectioner and this cuts the cost. The card covers only three days and is issued twice a week.

From the card we note that Mr. Brooks gets films about four months old, so it would seem that he uses all commercial. We think at least one reel should be not older than thirty days.

He also wants to know if the Pathe Weekly issued abroad is the same as that is distributed here. It is not. The Pathe Weekly is like a newspaper. Each country covers its territory and sends negatives to the other branches. The editor makes up his length as a newspaper editor makes up his columns with the most interesting of the foreign stuff, but with a majority of local happenings. Much of the material seen in the American Pathe Weekly is used abroad, but no two countries use precisely the same layout. In Europe only the biggest of the American scenes are used, as in America only the more important foreign events are "covered."

That Fool Censorship Again.

Here is a letter that sooner or later every exhibitor in a medium sized town is tempted to write. It comes from the local manager of an important circuit in a western town, the name of which, for obvious reasons, is withheld. The manager writes:

> The usual is happening here in this community ———— CENSORSHIP.
> Could you rush me a little of your "dope" that you have suggested from time to time?
> I am not kicking about any pictures that might happen to go close to the line, for every once in awhile I have enough sense to keep a picture that is apt to shock, locked up in a drawer. As for immoral pictures there aren't any, as you and I know, but that is not the point.
> They are trying to "put over" the "Murder, suicide, robbery, hold-up, stabbing, assaulting, clubbing, or beating of any human being" clause.
> If you would wish to send me any suggestions they will be most greatefully accepted.
>
> As far as this theater is concerned, we have this town by the ears, as it were. Ministers, school teachers, and professional men would rather come here than to any vaudeville or musical comedy trash that appears at the other theaters. I have sent you from time to time clippings showing how I have handled the newspapers; the Board of Education has received invitations from me for free performances for special children's pictures; I have run educational contests for Cinderella and Columbus; some time ago I prepared a pamphlet showing that I had run 181 educational subjects in ten months; just two weeks ago I received a letter from the very society that is furthering this movement commenting upon the excellency of our pictures—in short, this city has been hammered into submission, lifted from the "slough of despond" into which pictures had fallen before our advent into the field here, but, these self-appointed and constituted censorship committees are a nuisance, as you know. These "robbery," etc., clauses can become mighty detrimental.

The Waiting Game.

There is not very much that can be done for a time. This craze on the part of self-elected moralists to reform something is like a disease. It is infectious, and it must run its course. The more virulent the fever the quicker the cure, but there is bound to be a lot of trouble made and much money lost.

Very probably some house ran a picture that won the condemnation of some member of the reform society. Straightaway he decides that all pictures must be censored, and his fellow fanatics are with him from the jump. Drastic ordinances are enacted, and for a time enforced, but in the long run public opinion wins out, and the best thing to do is to appeal to the public's sense of fairness. When the exhibitors are fully organized and prepared to meet unitedly such invasions the campaigns will be shorter and more effective, but even without concerted work much can be done. Work through the papers and on the screen. Make personal appeals to men and women of influence. Conduct a campaign of education and take it into the church and schools. Do not lose your temper and become vituperative. Leave that to the others and maintain a dignity and calm that will be in contrast with the frenzied statements of the self-elected moralists. Where it can be done effectively ridicule is a powerful weapon. Twenty-five years ago when the first cigarette pictures of actresses came out the good people of the District of Columbia secured the passage of a law prohibiting the display of any of these pictures in which the actresses were not fully clad. One tobacconist on Pennsylvania Avenue draped all of his photographs in neat tissue paper skirts and raised a laugh that caused the law to be forgotten.

If They Only Knew.

If these people really knew about motion pictures they would not demand a sweeping censorship, but the trouble is that most generally they know little or nothing about pictures, and so they include the entire industry in a sweeping denunciation because some one subject offends.

Educate the general public. If a picture comes under the ban for what seems to be a foolish reason (and we know one picture that was thrown out not because of the murder it showed, but because a little child was struck once by the villain) take the matter to the papers. The reformers do not advertise. You do. Do not advocate the abolition of the censorship, but advocate intelligent censorship and then get the papers to take up the idiotic rulings that are certain to be made. Publish a description of the story and tell what was cut, and why. Here is where humor may be employed with effect. You will win the sympathy of the public from the start and in no time at all you will have the censorship laughed down.

If you have a picture withdrawn advertise the fact on the screen in a neatly worded slide. Tell just why, and leave the rest to the public. Use your best endeavor to get the pictures taken up by the schools. Offer your machine and operator and a suitable reel to some open-minded minister for Sunday services. Make your fight at every point and you'll have the censorship killed so dead that the corpse will never come to life again. Then watch your programs for the stuff that now and then will get past the national board. Most manufacturers are now more careful than the censorship, but now and then a picture like "The Battleground" will get out that hurts the entire business.

Getting Them Excited.

J. Howard Newell, of the Idle Hour, Bloomfield, Iowa, sends in a four-page folder in blue ink that he is giving to his patrons. The front is merely an H crossed by an I made from two-point rule (a pretty piece of lock-up, by the way). The back page merely announces "Photoplays." The second page is blank and the third page carries this:

Too Bad We Can't Let You In On the Secret Yet.

But It's So Good That You Will Relish It All the More When We Spread the Glad Tidings.

Within the next two weeks we are going to make an announcement that will set you wild with enthusiasm and will convince you that the IDLE HOUR theater means progressiveness in the Photo Play accessories.

The answer is that they are going to put in new chairs and new seats, but before this is made public there will be sufficient speculation as to the reason for the announcement to get the town by the ears. If you've something to make good with it is a good plan to get your people interested in a mystery now and then. Anything that makes the right sort of talk makes good.

Hints from Winstock.

Melvin G. Winstock, of the People's Amusement Company, Portland, Ore., has been busy with other things of late, but he has found time to slip over some hints. These are they:

We have offered our suburban theaters for the use of the public, civic, and municipal bodies to use them from ten to twelve for neighborhood purposes, and arrangements are being made on the part of the local societies to make good use of the offer.

We are also attempting to help the Baby Home here in the following manner: Saturday, October 10th, is RED PENCIL DAY, when they sell pencils at 10 cents each to help the baby home. We are running slides in our different theaters advertising this, and are permitting distinguished people to come into our theaters and give a two or three minute talk on the support of this great local charity. On the list are the governor, senators, legislators, and other citizens of prominence. Of course this does not directly put any money in our pockets, but it helps to establish the fact that we are a local institution and in the creation of a public sentiment in our favor, it cannot help doing some good.

We have also formed the habit of occasionally inviting either the Rotary, Ad, Press, Commercial, or Royal Rosarian clubs to a private exhibition of big special features as they come along. To-day, Monday the 7th, we have the Press Club to witness a private exhibition of "Custer's Last Fight." After the last performance about 10:30, at the Star Theater, we will run off "Custer's Last Fight," then serve refreshments consisting of sandwiches, cigars, etc. We find that this does us no harm, we get some publicity in the newspapers without paying for it, and if the picture is good, it sends out from 150 to 200 people talking about it, which is worth something.

Get them talking.

If you have followed the various Winstock hints you will note the one feature of them all. He does not spend his time with prize contests or stuff like that. He gets up ideas that will bring a lot of people to the theater and send them away talking about the house. That's the essence of good press work. A prize contest will interest, but few can win the prizes. Invite a club to the theater for some special event or help out a local enterprise and they will all talk. That's the way to get business.

On His Back.

We are afraid that Frank Montgomery is sleeping on his back, for he sends us a page from the Jacksonville Metropolis, in which it is stated that he has formed alliances with New York, Chicago, Boston, Paris, Rome and London, and will offer photoplays in his houses before they are seen elsewhere. We never heard of Boston as a producing center, and when we get down to Jacksonville in a couple of weeks we are going to make him prove it. It's the first time we ever had the chance to throw a brick at Mr. Montgomery, and we enjoy the novelty, but we think it's straining the probabilities a bit to announce Jacksonville as the starting point for films—and Boston.

Another Silas Wegg.

A. Powell, of the May Theater, Chicago, drops into poetry in his slide work and sends in a couple of his recent effusions. One was designed to quiet some boys who whistled, and Mr. Powell writes that after the slide the boys were quiet. It's our private opinion they were trying to make "no-moe" rhyme with "dodo," and were too busy thinking to whistle. It runs like this:

There once was a whistling hobo,
His "Hobo Frats" nicknamed him Do-Do;
This made him sad,
Then he got mad
And swore he'd whistle no-moe.

Rather better is one advertising Alkali Ike. It scans and rhymes rather better:

Look! See! Notice!
Sunday, Oct. 13th.
ALKALI IKE plays the DEVIL.
A Feature Comedy. The Best Ever.
He'll cause
The blind to hear, the lame to talk,
The deaf to see and the dumb to walk;
He'll cure for you all ails and ills,
Without Doc. Quackem's bitter pills;
The MAY will ring and roar with laughter,
That will be heard for days thereafter.

No one will ever journey to Chicago to hang laurel wreaths on Mr. Powell, but he gets the business in because, bad as it is, he gets the people talking about his poetry. Anything that gets them talking brings them in.

More of the Same.

And here is more Alfredaustin from Tally's Theater, Los Angeles; one of those Tallygrams that cannot help but make business. Give attentive ear and listen Poetry? ? ?

By the Editor.
Breathes there a man in this big town,
Who never yet has hied him down
To Tally's?

Whose heart has ne'er within him yearned,
As down Broadway his footsteps turned,
For Tally's?

If such there be, please let us know,
We'll send him a ticket to the show,
For few and scarce they are,
By Gollies,
Who haven't seen the show
At Tally's.

—Sey.

No, we don't like the last two lines either, but we had to have a word to rhyme with Tally's. If any bright party has a better word, send it in. A pair of loge seats for the best answer.

From China.

The Arcade Theater, Tien Tsin, said by a recent Consular report to be about the only permanent picture theater in North China, recently had the Oxford-Cambridge boat race and the Olympic games. For the latter they issued a twelve-page booklet giving the full story of the events and records, a sort of diary of the contests covering the full two weeks with an account of the origin of the Marathon on the back page. This was locally printed and probably most of the copies have been kept for future record. Only the front page advertises the date of showing, the rest being purely descriptive matter.

For the boat race an eight-page folder gives the London Telegraph's report of the race, the names and weights of the two crews, and an insert with five cuts in half tone, the cover carrying a line cut showing a map of the course and the upsets. This line cut was repeated in a large sheet with just a couple of the most exciting paragraphs, which break off with a reference to the booklet and the film. It is good, clean cut advertising of a sort that would not discredit a house with greater facilities at its command.

Another subject, this time a Milano drama, is advertised on what seems to be their usual form, a four page folder in red and black on a cream paper with a cut insert. This insert idea might be used with profit by some of our American exhibitors, since it permits the use of a coated paper for the half-tones and a rougher paper for the type forms. The insert is fastened in with a single wire stitch or staple.

Market Notes.

ALTHOUGH it was lately decreed that all scripts for Universal should be sent to 1 Union Square, we note the following request from Richard Willis, who is photoplay editor for the Los Angeles sections of the Universal:

> Mr. James Dayton and the writer would appreciate it if you would make it very clear in your department that we DO require good Western photoplays; Western comedies and dramas, cowboy and Indian subjects. The comedies should be split and full reels, the others in one and two reels.
> These should be sent to the Scenario Department, Pacific Coast Studios, Universal Manufacturing Co., Hollywood, Cal. We will pay good prices for acceptable stuff and will give our decisions promptly.

And from Richard V. Spencer, who has just gotten back home from his Eastern trip, we note:

> Since returning, I have learned that our market conditions have undergone a few changes. I have had a long talk with Mr. Ince, who is now General Western Manager of the New York Motion Picture Company, and he informs me that the Bison 101 pictures will be two and three-reel pictures exclusively in the future. We are not now producing any of the single reel type of Western stories.
> I suppose you noticed our ad in last week's WORLD, in which the firm quoted a minimum price of $50 for two-reel stories. This is no press agent yarn, but is backed by the authority of Mr. Ince and the other members of the firm. I am sure that this will be good news to the free lance and contract writers, and if they can deliver the goods, they will find a splendid market with us, as we now have two companies and four directors working on two-reel stories.

Since the letter was written the Bison-101 title has been abandoned as one of the clauses of the settlement between the Universal and the New York Motion Picture Company, but otherwise the information is still good. For Bison read Kaybee and you are up to date.

Pathe Freres ask writers to put their names and addresses on a separate sheet of paper and not on the synopsis sheet or plot of action. This sheet may be placed before the script or as an added page, but the note states that compliance with this request will reduce the time required for passing on a script.

Pop Hoadley is doing scripts for Powers and Champion, and the pretty typist is the photoplay editress for Universal as this is written, but with Hoadley and Bennie Schulberg in the same room we think she will make a better record than Hal Reid did, and she is not addicted to the pleasant habit of marking up scripts.

For San Diego Playwrights.

Photoplaywriters in San Diego who want to get together to talk over photoplays will please send in their names to this writer. They will be supplied with the address of an author who desires to start a photoplay circle in that city.

If You've Been Stung.

If you are among those who sent money to a Middle West concern that for a time liberally advertised its many industries, and they took your money and gave nothing in return, do not bother the courteous postmaster, who has been kept busy replying to complaints. Write to the Chief Inspector, Post Office Department, Washington, D. C., stating your case clearly and if possible sending a copy of the publication containing the advertisement that led you to part with your cash. If your money was sent by mail it lies within the province of the post office inspectors, but if the investment was induced by some advertisement in a publication circulated through the mails it gives the office a double club, since then the company used the mails for fraudulent purposes. It looks as though the concern would be put out of business on a criminal charge.

We Seek Instruction.

A New York school states that there are more than thirty film manufacturers who want more plots than they are able to secure. We will listen with attentive interest if they will tell of the thirty, providing that the thirty are so badly in need of scripts that they are willing to pay for them. It's got us guessing.

Going to Enlarge.

The November or December issue of the Photoplay Author will be doubled in size and the subscription price will be raised to one dollar. C. B. Hoadley will probably contribute a series if negotiations to that end now pending go through.

Once More.

Most of our readers have read it before, but several correspondents want to know how to use poems and other standard works. In the first place there is not much use in adapting poems for studio use since the studio has the same rights to the idea as the free lance and the studio man knows what the studio wants—which is more than the outsider does. But if you want to use a poem first find out if it is copyrighted. If it has been copyrighted find out if the copyright is still alive. If it is (and it may be that it is still copyrighted though the date on your copy suggests that the copyright has expired) get in touch with the owner of the copyright and make your deal if you can. Mostly you will have your trouble for your pains.

As we have said before the studio can supply the technique. From you it asks only new ideas and only the best of your new ideas.

No Wonder.

The other week we advertised a script that had gone by mistake to another player. Very promptly comes a letter from the owner. He signs his name, but the letter is written on the paper of a railroad company and the name of the town and the state has not been filled in, nor does the envelope give any clue since the postmark indicates that it was mailed on the train. If the author wrote the holder of the script we would suggest that he write again and give an address. Never let a letter, postal card or manuscript go out that does not contain your name and address in full and so plainly written that there can be no mistake. An author whose address is merely along the line of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern doesn't stand much chance of getting scripts or checks, but it is not probable that with such slovenly methods of working he ever gets checks. You can get a rubber stamp for thirty or forty cents that will save you all sorts of trouble.

The Vitagraph Editress.

Most photoplay writers have sent in scripts to the Vitagraph. Most of them have sent a lot more than one. Here is a picture of the giver of life and death out in the Greenville section. Now aren't you sorry you said things when that best script you ever wrote came back after staying in the office less than twenty-four hours? You were positive that no one could have read the story in so short a time where other offices take from four to ten weeks and you knew perfectly well that if anyone with intelligence had seen it it would have stuck, so you blistered the atmosphere and possibly you are still sore. Your script was read and read with care, but Mrs. Beta Breuil agrees with George Horace Lorimer that it is just as easy to keep abreast of your work as to stay four weeks behind and so the scripts that stand no chance of acceptance are returned with a promptness that is gratifying to those who know and the businesslike author takes first chance on Vitagraph because he knows that it will delay him so little in case the script does not find favor. Long practice and close study enable Mrs. Breuil to tell quickly if a script has a chance of acceptance, and if it has not she does not hold it a few weeks because she never worked out a system. It is not that the script has not been read, but that it has been read at once that no injustice may be done the author through delay. Now look at the picture again and utter your apology if you owe one.

Working Methods.

Here is another contribution on methods of work. It comes from Sydney S. Booth (not the photoplayer of that name) who writes that he has changed his mind abut destroying scripts that do not sell the first time out as he wrote he did a few weeks ago. Mr. Booth, it seems to us, is headed on the right track in that he matures the idea before he commits it to the mails, but his method of work is rather unusual. He says:

> In to-day's issue you ask a question, "How do you think?" It must be interesting to know all the different ways one has of working out a plot. Perhaps my way is the most usual one, or again it may be most unusual. This is what I do. I always go to the picture show in the evening and while there I study the plays from every angle. This was hard at first because my subjective mind was not trained to follow the different points as quickly as the pictures were reeled off. I get mighty tired sometimes of seeing the films but I invariably get recreation out of them for I know that I cannot write comic plays so I just sit and enjoy those without any regard, particularly, to the technique. After I leave the theater I always walk home, quietly, thinking about what I have seen. Invariably some glimmering of an idea will come to me spontaneously, usually in the form of some absurd title and this I proceed to masticate. Perhaps by the time I have arrived home something may have come of it. Then I sit down to my machine and hammer out a rough synopsis. Then I go to bed at once and lie there for a couple of hours in the dark and think. When I consider I have gotten the play into something like shape as to arrangement of scenes, etc., I get up and sit down to my machine again and work out the headings of the continuity and titles. Then I go to bed and to sleep, and I have not lost any sleep because I went to bed early. I have now in my possession matter that is fairly well co-ordinated and I let it simmer, sub-consciously, until I can get around to it again. I have lost nothing because I have it in black and white and have at the same time a greater grasp of my subject. Then I write it and send it in. Of course they come back, but I go on plugging and am slowly getting the thin edge of the wedge into the game. I have had one accepted, my seventh script, and have some under consideration, which look as though they may be accepted. I have only been writing since July and have only written eighteen in that time but I am getting there by degrees and am learning all the time. I think I have been very lucky to get in so early when most seem to take a year or two to put even one over.

More Terminology.

Here are a couple of small points we should like to see taken up as a part of the general plan for putting the pictures on their proper plane.

Use "part" instead of reel in multiple reel stories, as a "two-part" or "three-part."

"Picture" in place of film.

Not very important perhaps, but still helpful in eliminating the old atmosphere of cheapness and bringing the photoplay into its own.

Testimony.

"I would not have accepted any of them had I been the photoplay editor," writes a Louisville newspaper man. "That's what I admitted to myself (and told a few friends), after my first three photoplays had been returned by several leading film manufacturers. Of course I did not think that about them when they were mailed. If I had they would not have been sent out. I have not sold a single photoplay, but have been encouraged by the fact that I discovered in all I have written but one (the last), defects that even I (the author) can now realize would have prevented their sale. I say I was encouraged because I believe that this sort of experience will enable me to avoid perpetrating similar defects in others.

"As a newspaper man I have edited what many other men have written and I have had to use the blue pencil frequently on my own stuff. Each kind of editing helped me, so I want to state that (after learning the technique of the photoplay), I think one of the most helpful things for the beginner is for him to edit mercilessly his own photoplays—as much as possible before submission, and after rejection just as much more, unless he arrives at that stage where he can see that they simply will not do at all.

"The past summer a friend of mine sold four photoplays, one of which was a four-reel feature. He is not a newspaper man, an actor, a dramatic critic, a playwright of wide experience, a short story writer, a novelist nor a man with a pull with anybody connected with any of the film makers. He is an insurance man. He is observant, a thinker who makes his mind work for him, and is possessed of an acute sense of the dramatic. He told me the story of the feature. I know why it sold. It was the kind of story that tells itself."

Meeting the market.

Here is a bit of sage advice from David Morrison, who is a welcome visitor to these columns because he writes sanely. He says:

> I always find it a good rule not to malign the editors for the scripts they do not buy, but thank them for the scripts they do buy. What little success I have achieved, if twelve accepted out of thirty written be so called, is mine through the habit of studying the market and sticking at it. My one ambition now is to write a real scenario, one of those $100 brand. It may take long and it may take longer, but I'm going to try, not the proverbial three times, but three hundred and three, if that many be necessary.

Please note that he sells scripts because he studies the market and tries to give the editor what the editor wants. If more would study the wants of the editors instead of regarding any old thing they write (and all too often they are old things) there would be fewer complaints.

Libel.

In the October Photoplay Author, William Lord Wright states that "Successful photoplaywrights such as Sargent, Reid, Warren, Vinton, Hoadley, Plimpton and other top-notchers are emotional. Most of them are former thespians."

So far as we are concerned this is a libel, though we shall not sue Mr. Letendre, nor yet Mr. Wright. We believe that Mr. Plimpton's interest in theatricals was that of an amateur, the stage manager of a fashionable dramatic club. Mr. Hoadley, like this writer, is a newspaper man. Mr. Reid is a dramatist rather than a photoplay writer and this leaves Mr. Vinton and Giles R. Warren to carry out the statement. The only time we ever offended was going on at a dime museum one amateur night (when there were amateurs on amateur night), and this was done for the sake of the newspaper story there was in it. We do not recall that anyone praised us as a great emotional actor, though there was a wealth of criticism showered upon us about that time.

Not many actors can write good photoplays because they look purely on the theatrical side of their art, and are artificial rather than real. And the emotional or inspirational writer is rarely a lasting success. Photoplay writing is a business like everything else and must be followed as such. The best emotional players are not themselves emotional. They are cold and calculating, weighing each inflection, each shade of expression. The actor with emotions of his own is led astray by his moods. It is the same way with photoplay. Be sincere, but not emotional; business-like rather than inspirational.

Put your whole soul into your work, but do not lose your sanity.

Inquiries.

NOTE.—No question can be replied to by mail...Look for your answers here. A list of studio addresses, kept up-to-date, will be sent if a stamped and addressed return envelope accompanies the request.

ORIENT.—The younger brothers in that Biograph were given in the order of their senority. We have not the cast for "Ten Carat Hero" yet. Miss Kate Tanqueray was the wife in "A Limited Divorce."

H. W.—Cines is in two syllables according to the American pronunciation, and is pronounced as though spelled Sin-ees. In Italian it sounds more or less like Kines.

H. W.—We think that sample scenario published in the M. P. Story Magazine is the studio working script, and not the full script, though this is not stated. It should have had both synopsis and cast. Each studio has its own form of getting out a script, but for the author, follow the style given in "Technique of the Photoplay." What that school teacher you mention does not know about photoplays is shocking, even if she was an editor once. Even now she cannot write a decent script herself. Give cast and synopsis and definite action divided into scenes, and you can't go very far wrong.

A. W.—We have replied to part of your question in the Photoplaywright. Only two companies will accept synopses without the plot of action attached, and they do not always waive the plot. It depends on the company whether a delay in returning a script is a favorable sign or merely an indication of negligence.

R. R. P.—American does not supply casts. Miss Vedah Bertram was the girl in "Broncho Billy and the Indian Maid." The other Essanay player is not identified by the company.

E. R. C.—A feature film is one generally in two or more parts, and in any event a production more pretentious than the general run of films, one that is strong enough to be "featured" by a house manager. We share your puzzlement over the statement you quote. Anywhere from 16 to 300 prints are made of a subject, according to local demand and the foreign market. We cannot tell about Miss Joyce at present. No theater is "most likely" to have a certain make of pictures, the Herald Square is closest to it.

M. M.—The two clerks in "For the Sake of His Son" were Miss Dorothy Bernard and Alfred Paget. Miss Florence Barker had the title in "Jane Shore." She is now with Powers. William Bailey was George in "Back to the Farm."

H. D.—You cannot get with a picture company without experience and a pull.

M. W.—Ask something more easy.

M. A.—We do not place the player under that name.

L. W.—What do you mean by a picture being outlawed? Most of them are run as long as any gelatine stays on the celluloid, judging from some we've seen in the five-cent houses. Haven't that A. B. and we can't keep track of Vitagraph field companies. Ed Coxen was the bashful lover in "Hypnotic Nell," and William Humphrey the real emperor in "Bogus Napoleon."

J. M. M.—No one has any idea when the first Helen Gardner release will be made. It was reported as due in September, but it has not been announced yet.

H. H. S.—Miss White is with Crystal. We do not place Miss Carlton.

G. W.—If you yourself can see that the photoplay is poorly done, why not fix it up before you send it out again? That's what we would do.

M. E. D.—Too large an order to state all of the operas and Shakesperean plays filmed. Most of the operas have been done, except the Wagerian ring and Parsifal, and about half of the plays.

PLAYWRIGHT.—We cannot advise you without knowing something of your work. It is not a question of your present occupation, but your mental capacity and imagination. Keep on writing, but send out only the very best.

L. E. S.—Miss Dorothy Bernard was the girl in "The Girl and Her Trust." She is no longer with the company.

L. B.—No addresses in this department—see notice above.

J. M. J.—Edgar Jones was the pseudo minister and Miss Clara Williams the girl in "The Minister and the Outlaw."

W. I. G.—It probably was a Vitagraph, even if you did see it in an Independent house. Last week we saw the Cines "Daughter of the Spy" in both a Universal and a Film Supply house. There is no record of the release of the title by F. & E. which is the Feature and Educational Company. The story of Graziella was in the August 17th issue, page 692. It was not reviewed.

K. N. W.—You've a Biograph name we never heard of. The girl in "A Western Legacy" is not known to the Chicago office.

E. V. C.—We do not know the reason Mr. Anderson has not been in recent pictures.

D. L. B.—We cannot grade companies according to the merit of their production. We have troubles enough as it is. Champion is not reading scripts direct. Send an envelope for an address slip.

E. S. B.—We have not the casts for those two plays, and we cannot answer such vague questions as "who is it that generally plays, etc." Please be more definite and state some character.

C. H. H.—The only way to locate a subject in New York is to call up the branches of the General Film Company and ask. There is no set order of release.

E. F. F.—The first pictures you ask for are Kalems, not Lubins. Miss Ruth Roland had the parts in "The Schoolmistress of Stone Gulch," and "The Trail of Gold." Miss Mabel Normand was the wife in "The Furs." The last play is not correctly named.

B. G. U.—Your first questions have lately been answered. We do not know Miss Clayton's stage career. No Keystone casts yet. Generally we need questions nine days in advance.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

"THE GIRL IN THE CABOOSE" (Kalem), Oct. 24.—The Kalem people are so accustomed to having a railroad to play with, stories of railroads and railroaders are usually more than welcome. We do not think that the railroad chase, though sure of popularity, is so sure of getting over as is the more dramatic situation where a regular train is made to seem in danger from a washout or a gang of hold-up men, or malicious wreckers, and is saved by hero or heroine. The situation is rich in possible changes, while the chase is too likely to seem monotonous. The fact that the chase makes the climax of this picture is not a severe criticism; because the love story is [illegible] good humor. Marian Cooper makes a very good heroine. Her adventures in the caboose are brought about by a very attentive commercial drummer, who annoyed her, and on whom she and her railroad friends played a trick. His revenge brings an exciting episode and his punishment will please every one.

"THE BIWA CANAL AND SHOOTING THE RAPIDS AT KATSURAGAWA JAPAN" Selig) Oct. 21.—The first item is a traveling of unusual interest; the second item, shooting a rapid torrent in rowboats, is also [illegible] picture. The audiences applauded warmly. The two pictures on this reel make an excellent offering.

"GETTING ATMOSPHERE" (Selig) Oct. 25.—Film stories of film making have always been popular. They are the easiest kind of pictures to make truthful; for the producers are steeped in the atmosphere and it only needs to look to class traditions what is natural and choose what they copy well. Producer Robert Brunton has told us in "Getting Atmosphere," a [illegible] story of studio experiences, and told it with delightful humor and [illegible]. He needed a tramp and his character man [illegible] and found that would not pass. How the chosen hobo looked on the [illegible] make a very amusing picture. A number of the Selig [illegible] in the West appear in this studio farce as natives of the neighborhood. Phyllis Garden, Betty Harte, E. H. Philbrook, C. E. Green, etc.

"THE AWAKENING" Selig) Oct. 22.—The skillful planning and fine [illegible] which is [illegible] distinguishes most of the Selig dramas, has been at its best in working out the [illegible] of this picture. A friend [illegible] to get some money [illegible] and the husband's [illegible] to the test. [illegible] by other [illegible] the [illegible] wife, the [illegible] wife's [illegible] wife [illegible] wife's [illegible] wife [illegible] wife's [illegible] wife

"IN THE OSSAN VALLEY, PYRENEES, FRANCE" (Eclipse), Oct. 23.—Excellently photographed views of a beautiful mountain valley with a good sized stream. Glimpses of a village are included.

"MAKING BRIAR PIPES" (Eclipse), Oct. 23.—Of great interest to smokers. It was taken in Corsica and clearly shows the whole story of pipe making.

"A PERSISTENT FLY SWATTER" (Eclipse), Oct. 23.—The last item on the reel, a farce that made the house roar with laughter. It is a lively crockery breaking comedy with eccentric camera work that is often very amusing.

"IN THE SERVICE OF THE STATE" (Lubin), Oct. 22.—This story's hero, bereft of father and mother and sister in the same railroad wreck, becomes despondent. A man is needed to arrest a bad character who has just killed the sheriff. The hero, not having anything to live for, offers to go, and he falls in love with the badman's daughter. The death of the badman is conveniently accidental. It is well put together and is a fair offering.

"THE SIMPLE LIFE" (Pathe), Oct. 23.—A comedy giving the amusing predicament of a young and vivacious girl and her friends, including their chaperon. They buy out a band of gypsies, bag and baggage, and start out for a taste of the simple life in gypsy costume. They have a good time until they are arrested as suspicious characters. There is plenty of good fun in it, and it kept a large house in a ripple of laughter. It makes an excellent light offering.

"LITTLE RAVEN'S SWEETHEART" (Pathe), Oct. 24.—An Indian picture that decidedly pleased a little boy in the audience near us. Its hero and heroine are the two kiddies who have been seen in many other Pathe pictures. The first is an Indian lad, Little Raven; the other, a white girl, a lieutenant's child. The lad is greatly pleased with the little girl whom he sees at the fort and, when the tribe is about to attack the stage in which she is, he tries in vain to get help in time. After the capture of the girl, he and she escape together. It is a picture chiefly for children; but it will please them surely.

"THE OLD CHESS PLAYERS" (Lubin), Oct. 24.—A picture with much deep and true human interest. It is more a picture of friendship than a love story. The chess players are old friends, a pawnbroker and a cobbler, and they fall out over a game. Their children are lovers and, by this misunderstanding, are separated; but the trouble has an ending. The early scenes move too slowly; but as a whole, it makes a good offering.

"SCENES OF IRISH LIFE" (Vitagraph), Oct. 23.—The photographs are perfect and, surely, an Irishman took the picture. It will please everybody.

"AN EXPENSIVE SHINE" (Vitagraph), Oct. 23.—On the same reel, a dandy comedy in which Flora Finch and Kate Price play sisters. The former does a foolish thing and loses a diamond necklace which upsets the hotel. Paul Kelly, the hall boy, plays detective and gets "the goods" on E. R. Phillips. Flora Finch and Paul Kelly play true to types and make a very laughable picture. A good offering.

"THE NOODLE INDUSTRY" (Lubin), October 25.—An interesting educational and industrial picture, in which is shown some marvelous machinery.

"DOWN WITH THE MEN" (Lubin), October 25.—A comedy designed to show that when some women are put to the test they will go back to first principles—i. e., to the men.

"TOM THUMB" (C. G. P. C.), October 25.—A picture that will interest the little ones. When Tom first appears on the screen he is in his cradle—a walnut shell. At the age of ten he emerges from his mother's shoe and crawls into the batter. When put into the oven there is such a commotion his mother thinks the dish is bewitched, and pan and all are thrown to the street. A beggar opens the dish, Tom escapes, falls into the river, is swallowed by a fish, the fish is caught and sent to the king's table, where Tom makes a lot of fun for royalty. His end is in the mustard pot.

"THE HERMIT CRAB" (C. G. P. C.), October 25.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this close view of an underwater dweller, showing his mode of life and defense from attack.

"YOUNG MRS. EATON" (Edison), October 26.—Louise Beaudet as the unscrupulous woman of society plays her part to perfection in this drama. She portrays the type of woman so dangerous to the young and plastic matron. In this case the scheming bridge player brings to the verge of bankruptcy the husband of one of her victims. The situation is saved by the realization of the wife that a change must come, and she promptly takes steps to institute the reformation.

"DEATH VALLEY SCOTTY'S MINE" (Kalem), October 26.—This is a film featuring Walter Scott, the plunger one time known as a transcontinental record maker. The picture bears evidence of having been hastily thrown together so far as the scenario is concerned rather than take sufficient time to evolve a real story. There were all of the elements of the latter—the man, the support and the settings. The tale on the screen is crude melodrama.

"IN THE FURNACE FIRE" (Vitagraph), Oct. 26.—Mrs. Breuil, most of whose dramas and comedies have been deservedly popular, will add to her reputation as a writer of fresh plots by this love story of a working girl and a clerk in an express office. Edith Story plays the girl who loves, at first vainly, the clerk, played by Robert Gaillord. Zena Keefe plays the girl's younger sister, at first prefered by the clerk. Harry T. Morey plays a second clerk in the same office, a heavy villain's part, who gets Lena away from the other by getting him suspected of a theft. This gives Edith a chance to show true love and Lena a chance to show scorn. The man leaves America as a stoker and throws Lena's picture into the furnace. Director Frederick Thompson has directed with smoothness and convincing naturalness. It makes an excellent commercial release.

"NONE BUT THE BRAVE DESERVE THE FAIR" (Vitagraph), Oct. 28.—A very slight love story comedy in which a farmer's daughter falls in love with an elephant trainer connected with a circus visiting the village. Love comes through admiration of his courage in handling the big elephants; but they get loose and come to the farm where the girl finds out that they are gentle as kittens. The film makes good entertainment because of the elephants; it is rather novel to see them running fast down a dusty country road. Wm. Humphrey, the director, has made the incidents very natural by wisely choosing his views. Dorothy Kelly plays the girl; James R. Waite, her father, the farmer; Harry T. Morey, the elephant trainer, and Leo Delaney, the country lover. Miss M. Bertsch wrote it.

"THE FOREST RANGER" (Lubin), Oct. 26.—To say of any picture that it tells a good story in a fresh atmosphere and is, at the same time, unobtrusively instructive, is surely to commend it. Mr. Romaine Fielding, who produced this picture and who in it plays the most interesting character, the bad man, has made his picture's background fresh by making it convincing. It deals with a forest ranger's love story and has a climax in the midst of a realistic forest fire. It is very instructive; it shows, as natural parts of its story, how the wild mountain wood is guarded, how reports are sent in to the central office from fixed points and how, when a fire is started, the telephone brings help quickly. We also see the relief starting out and the men at work extinguishing the blaze. Mr. Fielding has his own style in making pictures, his peculiar use of near views and far views, that is pleasing. He handles his characters, too, in a fresh way that is often imaginative and that we like. This is not a great picture, but a very good and interesting one.

"AT THE BASKET PICNIC" (Biograph), Oct. 28.—The delightful human quality in this film's situation hands over to us a good, hearty laugh, while the sprightliness and naturalness of nearly all the action in the picture keeps a ripple of amusement going. A large audience very plainly enjoyed the film. It has the quality that will please everywhere.

"A REAL ESTATE DEAL" (Biograph), Oct. 28.—Two or three wholly unexpected farcical twists make this, on the same reel, very laughable. It lacks the humanity of the first part; but its amusing ridiculousness makes it very acceptable. An excellent offering to make a crowd merry.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY, No. 44."—A tremendously spectacular fire at oil docks of the Standard Oil Company makes this week's topical a trump card, even more than usual. A half-dozen fiery explosions have been caught. It would be well to instruct the drummer to watch for 'em and bang away when they blow up.

"AN IRISH GIRL'S LOVE" (Lubin), Oct. 28.—Mrs. Geo. B. Walters gives an Irish dance at a party in this picture and wins a head of cabbage. It is the best entertainment in it. But the story, though slight, has an interesting climax and was liked. The Irishness of it, in playing and costumes, is artificial.

"FRENZIED FINANCE" (Pathe), Special Release.—A hand-colored film in three reels, telling a story of fashionable Parisian life. Beautiful scenes rather than human interest have been accentuated. The action moves slowly, although the story is dramatic and holds the interest closely, especially in the last reel. Yet the most entertaining thing in it is not an integral part of the story; it is a beautiful dance, by professional artistes, given by the story's hero as entertainment for his friends at a dinner party. It is called "The Dance of the Golden Calf" and delighted the audience, who applauded it as though it had been produced on the stage before them. This strange, Oriental dance raises the value of the release as an offering to the public to high rank; for, in it, something distinctly fresh is provided. In coloring, acting, direction, etc., it is a graceful film.

"THE POWER OF A HYMN" (Kalem), Oct. 28.—Perhaps for as long as audiences listen or see there will be a majority who will find emotion and edification in a religious situation that follows along well-known lines and teaches, even crudely, what is firmly accepted as orthodox. Whenever this is done with art, the popularity of the offering will be assured. This picture will, we believe, enjoy a good measure of success. It shows, in different backgrounds and with new characters, a hymn as recalling so strongly his innocent boyhood to a criminal about to add to his wrong doing, that he relents and breaks down. This time, he is about to shoot his own, unrecognized, brother, the judge who had once sent him to prison, when the brother plays the old hymn. The two boys of the early scenes are William Bodie and Judson Milford. In the later scenes, they have grown up and are now Knute Rahmn and Carlyle Blackwell. Wm. H. West, Mrs. Dunlap and Jane Wolff also have parts in it.

"BUNNY AT THE DERBY" (Vitagraph), Oct. 29.—A delightful Bunnygraph in English atmosphere. Besides the comedy, which Bunny carries almost wholly, there are good views of the Derby, the greatest horse racing event in England. Mr. Larry Trimble produced it.

"JUST LUCK" (Vitagraph), Oct. 29.—Harry T. Morey plays this one part picture, as Hard Luck Harry who tries to realize on his dollar accident policy. By a clever reversal of the camera some very laughable situations are created. The two on this split reel will prove acceptable.

"WHIFFLES, CUBIC ARTIST" (C. G. P. C.), Oct. 29.—This farcical situation must have been conceived by an artist and it is startlingly fresh. The exhibition of the cubism artist's work is about as funny as anything could well be. Perhaps cubism is going to be the post-post impressionism, and we may come to it yet. The offering is extremely farcical, entirely fresh and, with the truly marevelously colored picture of Alpine scenery on the same reel, makes a very desirable release.

"IN THE TYROL, THE ARLBERG VALLEY" (C. G. P. C.), Oct. 29.—Perfectly photographed and beautifully colored, it gives the impression of paintings.

"MISS SIMKINS' SUMMER BOARDER" (Essanay), Oct. 20.—A comedy of a basket picnic and anybody who has ever been to one will know the possibilities of such. The picture is true enough perhaps even to be painful to one or two simple souls who have been caught in the same way as was John Steppling. He was in love with Mildred Weston, as was also Whitney Raymond, a native of the village. Steppling's boarding housekeeper, Miss Simkins (Eleanor Blanchard), was in love with him. Evebelle Prout mixed those baskets up and Steppling outbid Raymond and got left. The fun comes from the convincing character sketching. Lily Branscombe, Dolores Cassinelli, Beverly Bayne, Mary McNackin, also Howard Missimer, Wm. Mason and Bryant Washburn all have parts. It is a good offering and made hearty laughter.

"BURMAH, RANGOON" (Edison), Oct. 29.—Excellent photographs of deeply interesting scenes.

"BRINGING HOME THE PUP" (Edison), Oct. 29.—It was a wise choice, this wholesome, very human comedy, on the same reel with the educational travelog of Burmah. No one who was half-human could see this picture, "Bringing Home the Pup," without laughing heartily and going away on better terms with himself. There isn't a foot of it that isn't funny and all the funny things are as fresh, as wholly unexpected and as quick as wit. It is just the picture for a church or the Bowery or anywhere.

"JIM'S VINDICATION" (Selig), Oct. 29.—A Western story with no women in the cast of characters. William Duncan is author and producer, and as usual with his work it has good action, good riding and good scenery. The situation was fabricated to give these three still popular qualities and reaches its objection very well. William Duncan himself plays the pony express man, who is falsely accused of theft, is helped out of prison and vindicates himself by capturing the thief. Lester Cunio plays the thief; Rex de Rosselli, the sheriff. Frank McClintock, Marshall Stedman and Charles Reeves have important roles and there is a big posse composed of "Colorado's Best," according to the bulletin.

"THE FISHERBOY'S FAITH" (Selig), Oct. 28.—The producer of this picture, Colin Campbell, with the good help of his leading lady, has told its story very prettily and in a poetic atmosphere. It was taken on the Pacific Coast and is a simple love story of a fisherman's daughter (Bessie Eyton) who goes away to college and is educated above her girlhood's sweetheart, the fisherlad (Thomas Santschi). He rescues her new lover from drowning. The picture is excellent entertainment more on account of its style than of its story. Many of the views are lovely and the story, though not very new, is told with that economy of attention that keeps it from dragging Lanier Bartlett is the author. Hobart Bosworth, Herbert Rawlinson, Frank Richardson, Anna Dodge, Betty Harte also have good parts.

Independent

"THE TRIBAL LAWS" (Bison, Universal), Nov. 16.—This two-reel picture with the great Southwest as its locale, will make the most blasé picture goer sit up with interest. If anything, the start is a shade too strong, wih its terrific Indian warfare and other startling scenes. But the plot, when it gets to going, is unusual. The main incident recalls the scene where Uncas displayed the Turtle on his bosom, in "The Last of the Mohicans," thus establishing himself as a mighty chief of the Lenape. The Hopi Indian scenes, the Pueblo on the desert, and all of the realistic features are notable.

"GONTRAN'S LOVE STRATEGEM" (Eclair), Oct. 27.—The plot hinges upon the use of a hair restorer invented by an aged chemist, who has promised to give his daughter in marriage to the man who grows the most hair with it. Much competition ensues, the hero pretending to be bald and then finally exhibiting a fine crop of hair. A good climax helps out the rather obvious plot.

"BRUSIA" (Eclair), Oct. 27.—Scenic effects obtained in Asiatic Turkey, rendered additionally interesting by the warfare of that country with the Balkan states. Shows Green Mosque, built in 1420, and Turkish cafe, where Pierre Loti did much of his writing. Good lighting effects.

"THE FOREIGN SPY" (Imp), Oct. 28.—Absorbing international intrigue, well handled by the principals and minor characters also. The hero, endeavoring to carry certain papers to San Francisco, is beset by Secret Service agents, who use the wiles of a beautiful woman against him. This rather familiar situation is relieved by the introduction of Ben, a boy of the streets, whom the hero has befriended, and Ben's sister. They are drawn into the machinations of the plot and appeal at once to the observer. The hero is saved from a drug potion by Ben, and after a lively denouement the affair ends happily for everyone but the lady villain and her conspiring friends.

"CAREFUL NURSING" (Rex), Oct. 31.—Although highly improbable in character, this film will appeal to many people as first class comedy, and will certainly bore no one. A woman leaves her husband and becomes nurse to a rich man. Four young men in the house become enamored of her charms, and all pretend sickness. They follow her about the house, attired in pajamas, demanding her care and attention. Her husband, learning her whereabouts, disguises himself as a woman and hires out as assistant nurse. Much grotesque comedy follows.

"MAKING A MAN OF HER" (Nestor), Nov. 1.—A girl out of work essays the difficult role of a young man, and procures employment as cook on a ranch. She carries the part better than usual, but, of course, is discovered to be a woman, after being forced into a prize fight, etc. The young ladies on the ranch make the discovery when her cap comes off and her long hair falls about her shoulders. They continue to accept her as a young man, and their attentions cause much jealousy among the cowboys. An amusing offering.

"THE OLD DOLLMAKER" (Gem), Nov. 29.—The dollmaker's shop, in New York, makes an attractive setting for the commencement of this film. Then follows the elopment of the old man's daughter with her lover. Six years later poverty overtakes them, and the daughter longs for reconciliation with her father, who has never seen his grandchild. Interesting street scenes on the East Side give tone to the picture. The picture ends happily and has the human interest touch.

"THROUGH A HIGHER POWER" (Rex), Oct. 27.—The fierce passion of a Mexican love affair is here presented in graphic style, with Marion Leonard in the feminine lead. She demonstrates the truthfulness of Kipling's observation that "the female of the species is more deadly than the male." The atmosphere and costuming are excellent, but the title and subtitles are somewhat melodramtic.

"FATTY'S BIG MIX-UP" (Nestor), Oct. 30.—In this conventional, but entertaining Western reel, the ranch cook situation is reversed. This time it is a man who masquerades as a woman and begins a series of stirring incidents at the Luck Branch. When the real lady cook arrives, she finds him under the bed looking for his trousers and other masculine garb.

"THE TRANSGRESSION OF DEACON JONES" (Eclair), Oct. 31.—An original conception, containing a moving picture within a moving picture, and a good love story. The young moving picture man catches the Deacon, his prospective, but unwilling father-in-law, playing the shell game at a county fair. He makes moving pictures of the Deacon and thus breaks down the opposition to the match. Some good county fair scenes and a lively plot.

"CALL OF THE DESERT" (Nestor), Oct. 28.—Because the characters playing the lead in this picture do their work naturally and sympathetically, they make a strong appeal to spectators. The man and wife give up the hard life in the desert mining camp and try social life in the city. The man tires of this and goes back to the desert. But the wife lingers, and when she finally yields to the "call" it brings joy to the heart of the husband awaiting her. A big theme, well worked out.

"SUE" (Champion), Oct. 28.—The fore part of this picture is a first-class idyl of the Kentucky mountains. It tells a good story and retains the interest throughout, but the latter part is marred by its sudden descent into melodrama of the most startling order. The change comes so sharply and is so far overdrawn as to almost destroy the illusion of reality. The character work is good.

"GAUMONT WEEKLY," No. 23, October 23.—Pictures of the battleships in New York harbor, the Kaiser's review of autumn maneuvers, after scenes of the Roosevelt shooting, and other good features insure the success of this number.

"MAIDEN AND MEN" (American), Nov. 4.—A pathetic offering by the premier company, in which the girl heroine, inspired by reading a romantic novel, leaves her father's cabin and goes to find her lover at a neighboring ranch. Her unfortunate experiences lead her to return, and the picture closes with her tearing up the novel. Pauline Bush, as the heroine, is compelling as usual, but she kept her back square to the camera through much of the first part of the picture.

"DOOLY'S TRIUMPH" (Comet), Oct. 28.—Good story of love and humor, treated in a brisk, modern way. The young Irishman's efforts to get on "the force" in spite of physical handicaps, so his girl will marry him, is amusing and well presented throughout. Even the sub-titles assist in the humor of the affair. A desirable offering.

"HOW SHORTY KEPT HIS WORD" (Broncho), Oct. 30.—If there is any special difficulty with this picture, it is an excess of plot. The arrangement of scenes is somewhat broken, but there is a good story in it, and some appealing character work. Photographically it is a little uneven.

"AT CONEY ISLAND" (Keystone), Oct. 28.—On the same reel. Mack Sennett and Mabel Normand are featured in a diverting love escapade at Coney Island. The steeplechase and other attractions at the amusement resort are always entertaining. The two offerings on a split reel make an excellent offering.

"A GROCERY CLERK'S ROMANCE" (Keystone), October 28.—A rapid-fire bit of nonsense, beginning with a grocery clerk who stops to do a washing for a tired woman, and ending with an interrupted wedding. Her husband awakens to what is going on and hastens to claim her before it is too late.

"A WOMAN ALONE" (Majestic), Oct. 29.—In this story there are practically two narratives, the first showing how the young wife is left alone by her husband's suicide, and the second, how she wins another husband after a dramatic office scene. The flirtation across the court of the high building is clever, and the rescue of the young widow stenographer by her new admirer is effective.

"OH! MY PIPE" (Lux), Nov. 1.—How Adventurous Willy carries a clay pipe safely through a series of French knockabout scenes, and then breaks it on his own table at home. The best of its kind.

"HENPECKED'S BID FOR FREEDOM" (Lux), Nov. 1.—On the same reel with above. A lively story of how Henpecked decides to commit suicide and then, instead, leaves a note under his hat by the river, and goes off to dine with some friends. His wife and family are soon on the trail, and locate him by the aid of a dog. The pursuit is good and the picture well worth while.

"THE EMPEROR'S MESSAGE" (Gaumont), Nov. 7.—This is an extraordinarily good film considered both as a scenic and as a drama. The beautiful Pyrenees Mountains between France and Spain constitute the setting. Napoleon Bonaparte and one of his drummer boys are the principal male characters; a young matron at whose house the Little Corporal stops and with whom he falls in love, is the principal female character. All the roles are splendidly handled. The woman asks Napoleon, when he leaves her home, to send her a message in the hour of battle. He grants her request and sends the drummer boy to execute it. The camp scenes of the Napoleonic army and the battle are stirring. The messenger's adventures are breathlessly interesting. Altogether the production is exceptional and cannot fail to make a hit. Too much good cannot be said for it.

"CUPID'S LOTTERY" (Gaumont), Nov. 5.—This is a very refreshing comedy. The story, highly original, tells of a department store clerk who wins £4,000 in a lottery and proceeds to enjoy high life, stipulating with his employer, however, that he may return to his job at the end of ten days. This he does. But meanwhile he has loved and won the love of a wealthy manufacturer's daughter and she refuses to give him up even after she finds out his true position. The production is very commendable, splendidly acted and carefully staged. It will be viewed with pleasure by the discriminating.

"JOHN STERLING, ALDERMAN" (Imp), October 31.—This is a strong picture, a fine one. King Baggot and Jane Fearnley have the leads and they are most competently supported by a good cast. The characters, especially those of the politicians, are convincing and portray life. One especially strong situation is that where Mr. Baggot, as the alderman, is called to the office of the railroad president, there to meet that official and his attorney, and is confronted with an acquaintance of other and less pleasant days. The work of all is of the best; it is thrilling. There will be doubt in the minds of some, perhaps, as to how the district attorney and the police officers were able to secrete themselves in the office of the railroad president, but this seems to be the only weak point. The story will hold closely all the way through the two reels. Miss Fearnley, in the home scenes, was especially good.

"THE COWBOY GUARDIANS" (Bison), October 29.—There is in this picture a strange interweaving of tragedy, buffoonery, pathos and comedy.

"A DREAMLAND TRAGEDY" (Powers), November 6.—There are strong situations in this drama. The story is novel from several points of view, but it is logical throughout. The best scene is where the father, portrayed by Frank Russell, has brought to his home the paymaster, in love with his daughter, under the influence of liquor. The father knows the paymaster is carrying the payroll, and the money has aroused his cupidity. The daughter, splendidly assumed by Florence Barker, finds the paymaster and gets him out of the house and on his way to his home. Her brother comes home, tired out, and throws himself on the bed and falls asleep. The father returns and strangles the son in his efforts to get the payroll. The daughter returns, hears the commotion, and enters the room, the streaming light showing to the father that he has killed his own son. It is all a dream, to be sure, and the terror of the daughter as she awakes in the kitchen of her home, where she had dropped asleep in her chair, is very real. The sight of her father and brother and sweetheart, in sound health, drives her to tears for relief. The producer and all who have to do with this picture are deserving of high praise.

"THE COLLABORATOR" (Powers), October 30.—A burlesque, but it will amuse.

"VISIT TO OUR PRESIDENT'S SUMMER HOME" (Powers), October 30.—On the same reel as the foregoing are scenes about the grounds of the President's home at Beverly, including an intimate view of President and Mrs. Taft.

"A RED MAN'S LOVE" (Bison), November 5.—Good Western drama, in which Virginia Chester, Mona Darkfeather, Charles Bartlett and Ortego have parts.

"THE TRAGIC WEDDING" (Milano), November 2.—An emotional drama with a sensational climax—wherein an automobile is driven over a cliff. The machine is pretty badly smashed. There are some fine interiors and exteriors, scenes of a fashionable wedding and much withal to interest especially the feminine portion of an audience.

"A TRAMP'S STRATEGY" (Champion), November 4.—Charles Graham as the tramp takes the honors in this comedy in which there is a father who wants his daughter to marry the man of his choice—and she is unable to see the situation as father does.

"THE TRIBAL LAW" (Bison), November 16.—This tale of the Hopi Indians will interest throughout the two reels. It is more a story of the Indians as Indians. Margarita Fischer, Charles Inslee and Wallace Reed have leads. Otis Turner is the producer, and he has done well. The drama is reviewed at length elsewhere in this issue.

"MAKING AN AMERICAN CITIZEN" (Solax), Oct. 30.—The story is strongly told. The title amply explains the picture—how a foreigner, accustomed to treating his wife as a beast of burden and of beating her as he would a beast, has the American spirit whipped into him. He began on his wife at the Battery, and was shown his mistake. In the tenement a neighbor gave the busband further lessons when the wife was abused; in the country, where the couple take up their home, a farmer uses a horse-whip. That being insufficient, six months on the stone-pile are given the newcomer. As the embryo citizen emerges from the correctional institution the reformation is about complete. He is shown under improved circumstances—and now he is considerate of his wife. Lee Beggs plays the immigrant and Blanche Cornwall the wife. The two make a strong team. Their work is impressive and forceful.

"THE BALKAN CRISIS" (Gaumont), Oct. 26.—Views of preparations for hostilities in the war zone.

"AT THE 'PHONE" (Solax), Nov. 6.—This picture is made unnecessarily barrowing by reason of the display of a knife in the hands of burglar, the sinister aspect of the weapon accentuated by his drawing it across his throat a couple of times. The burglar finally came to the conclusion that must have struck an observer at first, i. e., that the two children in the adjoining bedroom could in no way act as a bar to his plans. The husband who had just taken his wife to a hospital for an operation and then, when he overheard the dialogue between the two crooks in his house by reason of the unhooked receiver, collapsed when he should have been active, displayed poor stuff. The picture as a thriller is a success.

"GOD'S UNFORTUNATE" (American), Nov. 7.—Pauline Bush dominates this picture. She does strong work in a strong story; it is even more—it is a good story. The film is enhanced pictorialy by the selection of great big backgrounds.

GAUMONT WEEKLY No 34.—An unusually well-filled number, containing many short views of interesting news events.

"PETTICOAT CAMP" (Thanhouser), Nov. 3.—A party of husbands and wives go to an island for a summer outing. The women get tired of doing all the drudgery of the camp and decide to move to an adjoining island. The men arrange a mock raiding party and set out armed with clubs. They are received with pistols. They show up the next day armed with a flag of truce. The picture will amuse. There is one scene, however, that is particularly striking, where the wives have a bathing party all by themselves. The reviewer was in doubt whether the swimmers were the same girls who appeared in the remainder of the film. Certainly they are finished water nymphs.

"THE STARBUCKS" (American), Nov. 9.—It is a pleasure to say that here is a rare domestic drama. Opie Read is the living, breathing Jasper Starbuck. There are many screen artists of reputation who will profit from a study of Mr. Read in his characterization of the illicit distiller. The American company is to be congratulated for its work in this picture. Also, it is to be thanked. The World has reviewed this film at length. To the praise of Mr. McQuade we can only add that all he said is true—if possible, we would have made it stronger.

Kinemacolor

"PICTURESQUE NORTH WALES" (Kinemacolor).—Picturesque scenes of coaching and automobile trips and views of native carts; also pictures of mountains and falls and old castles.

"NATIONAL CAPITAL HORSE SHOW" (Kinemacolor).—Views of society on a holiday. There are scenes in the paddock, of the passing before the judges, of the hurdle jumping—in fact, a complete review of a notable function.

"JACK AND THE BEANSTALK" (Kinemacolor).—This is a charming picture out of an old book—one that will with children visualize one of their best stories; and grown folks will follow it with the deepest interest. The child is played by Thomas Carnahan, and the selection reflected great credit on the producer. The little fellow will make many friends, with his sweet face and yellow locks, and, best of all, his real ability in front of the camera. Pictorially the picture is a gem; dramatically it is all that can be desired.

NOTES FROM THE ESSANAY WESTERN COMPANY AT NILES.

THAT the Essanay company will have a branch studio and factory in California within the next few months is now a surety. Plans and specifications have already been completed for a $25,000 structure at Niles, where Mr. G. M. Anderson and company have been located for the past eight months.

For two years Mr. Anderson has been seeking a permanent location with the intention of building a branch studio and factory, but none proved satisfactory until the scenic grandeur of Niles attracted attention. Bungalows were immediately erected to house the photo players. Steps were then taken to secure a portion of land near by for a factory site. This was done through the efforts of Mr. Anderson of the western company. Following a recent visit to Niles by Mr. George K. Spoor of Chicago, president of the concern, the deal was closed.

Miss Evelyn Selbie.

Construction will start immediately and upon completion, stables, blacksmith and machine shop, garages and several cottages will be built.

More actors and actresses will be employed and then two companies will represent the western division.

Miss Evelyn Selbie, formerly of the Melies company, is now a member of the Essanay western company, playing leads and heavies. She is an expert horsewoman and showed her extreme coolness in danger recently by assisting Texas George Briggs in a shooting act near Niles. Miss Selbie held a number of small pieces of card board in her fingers while Briggs, who is also a member of the company, shot each one in turn into bits.

Raymond Robinson, property man of the company here, became a benedict the other day and his home coming was celebrated in true western style, and finally resulted in train passengers being scared out of their cushioned seats and off the train. Raymond and his wife were met at the station by fifteen "cowboys" with big "forty-fives" on their hips. Thirty rounds were fired by each "cowboy" as the train pulled in. Passengers piled out of the coaches thinking they were the victims of a band of hold-up men. The newlyweds were then compelled to ride through the streets of Niles sitting in a canopied wagon bedecked with signs suggestive of the state of matrimony and the fact that it had not been many days since Raymond was single. The bride is the daughter of a prominent local resident, while the groom has been with Mr. Anderson for over three years.

David Kirkland, who performed for the Essanay company when it was in San Rafael and at one time with Kolb and Dill, is now a member of Mr. An erson's company at Niles.

Questions Answered.

Sometime since I promised to ask certain questions of Branch No. 2, Local Union 35, New York City. The questions were: (a) Has the operator the right to operate a spot light when same is placed outside of his operating room? (b) If Branch No. 1 and Branch No. 2, of Local Union No. 35, have equal rights as claimed and each is entitled to govern its own affairs, how is it that Branch No. 2 cannot elect its own officers? I have propounded these questions to the Executive Board of Local Union 35, with the following result: Question A: Technically the operator has no such right, since spot lights are entirely within the jurisdiction of Branch No. 1. Branch No. 1, however, without relinquishing its technical right, in practice concedes to Branch No. 2 men the right to operate a spot light located outside the operating room, provided the same be used in conjunction with their show. Question B: This is a matter which can only be done by President Shay, upon recommendation of Branch No. 1, but President Shay has already intimated in open meeting that if the orderly meetings, and the present exceedingly satisfactory state of affairs continues to exist, he hopes that Branch No. 1 will soon recommend to him that Branch No. 2 be given the right to elect their own officers. The Executive Board informed me, positively that about the first of the year they would make this recommendation. It may therefore be expected that in the early part of 1913 Branch No. 2 will elect its own officers, with the possible exception of the president. I myself suggested to the Executive Board that it would be inadvisable to turn the presidency over to Branch No. 2, until such time as the orderliness of the meetings have become firmly established. Whether the Executive Board will adopt my suggestion in this respect, I cannot say, but I hope they will. The meetings of Branch No. 2 so far, are a credit to that organization, and if those meetings continue, I have great hopes that in the comparatively near future, New York will have a strong and thoroughly effective operators' union, containing within its ranks every competent operator in the city.

Excellent Book.

From the press of Ganes, Limited, England, comes an excellent little work entitled "The Motor Generator." There are about sixty pages of text matter, and quite a few illustrations. The author, Mr. James W. Barber, A. M. I. E. E., uses English terms, of course, but as a text book on the care of the motor and the electric generator, the work is fairly comprehensive and is readily understood by the average reader. The theory of electric generation is also very well explained.

Setting Power's "Six" Intermittent.

Fall River, Mass., orders a new Handbook and says:

> I have a new Power's "Six" and would like instructions as to setting the intermittent movement. The intermittent sprocket has too much play and the picture jumps; especially the titles. I found turning the bushing had no effect, so I knocked it in a trifle and that fixed it. Is it a tapered or an eccentric bushing? Eliminated Mr. Ghost by moving the front condensing lens back toward the rear one. I can just get a piece of paper between them now, and the ghost is gone. My picture is 14 feet and a 71-foot throw.

In the first place, Fall River, Power's No. 6 intermittent sprocket shaft bushings are eccentric, not tapered. You will find complete instructions in the new Handbook for setting the intermittent. Driving the bushing in should have no effect at all, one way or the other, but turning them so that the side next the lamphouse moves upward, tightens the geneva cross against the lock ring, or cam, which eliminates lost motion in the intermittent sprocket. But if your tension is right, a little lost motion in the intermittent sprocket will make no dinerence in the picture. In fact, the genevas are seldom so closely adjusted at the factory that all lost motion of the intermittent sprocket is eliminated. You say that the titles jump more than the picture. I think not. The fact is you can see the jump in the titles more plainly, but if the titles do jump more than the film itself, then the fault is at least partly in the film itself. The new Handbook will, I think, fix you up completely in this respect. It contains very complete photographic instructions on Power's "Six," the Edison, Simplex, Motiograph and Standard machines.

Flicker.

Columbus, Ohio, sends in the following complaint:

> I have tried the salt brine stunt, treating the carbons as did others who have had good results, but friend Linstruth, page 147, October 12th issue, has expressed my experience, which was not at all satisfactory. I just put a new casting on the left side of my Exhibition Model Edison machine and am now troubled with considerable flicker. When I run fast or slow it is worse. I am using 6½ and 7½ condensers; project a 9-foot 4-inch picture at 80 feet. When the lamphouse is eighteen inches from the stereo lens the light is clear and bright (12-foot stereo picture), but the M. P. lens gives a very poor light. The M. P. illumination is better when the lamphouse is twelve inches from the aperture plate. Would you blame this on the condensers?

It is a strange thing that the same procedure, as applied to salt brine, seems to bring different results in different cases. You will have to explain more definitely what you mean by "flicker." The term "flicker" means flashes of darkness on the screen, making, in effect, a fluttering of the light. I do not see how you could possibly get this particular effect when running fast. The slower the speed, the worse the flicker; not sometimes but all the time. Possibly you have a travel ghost, but I am inclined to think, from what you say, the difficulty lies in the fact that you are using a three-wing shutter, and 60 cycle A. C. This does not seem probable since you are using an Exhibition Model B machine, for which, so far as I know, no three-wing shutter is furnished, but it nevertheless fits in with what you say. Please come forward with more definite information, Columbus. You are using very long focal length lenses and should by all means have two 7½-inch condensers—in fact, I think an 8½-inch condenser in front and a 7½ behind would be better, but inasmuch as the 8½-inch condersers are more expensive, first try two 7½ lenses.

A Queer Proposition.

Akron, Ohio, writes:

> Run two Motiograph 1912 Model machines fifteen hours a day. Current comes through Fort Wayne compensarcs, and I have considerable trouble with the wires on my lamps. The lower one breaks at least three or four times a month, but the upper wires have not been out of order for four months. Use 60 amperes of A. C., the line voltage being 250. I find the upper wire is cool outside of the lamphouse, while the lower wire is so hot that I cannot put my hand on it. Have changed the wires often, but it is still the same. When I pull the switch, I notice the lower carbon is red down two inches from the top, while the upper carbon is only red half an inch of its length. I get a good light and no ghost, and would like to know why or how often the wires should burn out. The lower carbon burns the faster. Use 5/6 Bio. Machines are running O. K.

I was going to suggest a ground on the lower wire, but what you say about the carbons makes me scratch my nose. I take it that these conditions prevail on both machines alike. Clean your lower carbon contacts thoroughly, since poor contact would have something to do with the heating of the lower carbon. Interchange the two wires at the lamp—that is, put the upper one below and the lower above, and see if the lower one, which was the upper one, gets hot, and the upper one, which was the lower one, is cool. If any brother can suggest the cause of this peculiar condition, I will be glad to hear from him. The wires inside your lamphouse should, if you are using 60 amperes, be cut off at the point where they enter the lamphouse, after from forty to fifty hours' run.

Wrong Dope.

Seattle, Wash., writes:

> Have your Handbook, which I bought from a man from whom I learned to operate, and who is running an operators' school in this city. After having learned to operate a machine I find it very difficult to secure a position in Seattle. Have been told that I must first get a job in the country and get experience thus, and must have at least three months' experience to enable me to join the union. I have a position now, although it does not pay much, but am afraid to strike out and go from town to town looking for a job, since what little money I have would soon be exhausted if I were not immediately successful. Would you kindly advise me as to what should be done?

You don't say whether it is the union which insists on your getting experience in the country, or not. However, whoever gave you this advice is wrong from any and every point of view. The presumption is that they intend you to get a job of operating in the country and inflict the result of your experience on country audiences, rather than city audiences. With this I cannot agree. The country audience pays the same price the city man does, and is entitled to see just as good a show. I heartily agree, nevertheless, that you should be obliged to serve an apprenticeship, and that apprenticeship should not be a three months one, but from six months to two years. The only thing I can suggest to you is that you get a position in some theatre in Seattle as operator's apprentice, or assistant. Failing in this, get a position as usher, with the agreement that you later be taken on as operator's assistant. You say you have "learned" to operate a moving picture machine. There is nobody who can learn to operate a moving picture machine through taking a course in a school. Schools can teach the theory of things and a few of the practical things, but operating is, like any other profession, only learned through extended practical experience, and this experience must be had in the operating room of a theatre. It cannot possibly be had in the right way anywhere else.

Chicago Law.

Chicago, Ill., sends in the following communication:

> Will you please inform me how I can obtain license as operator? Two years ago I went into the moving picture business by purchasing a machine and giving exhibitions over the country. I understand the machine thoroughly and can operate it just as well as the man who made it; also can maintain a good light all the time and understand electricity very well indeed, yet the Moving Picture Department of Chicago has twice refused to examine me on the grounds that I have not served anybody for one year. I made a complaint to Mayor Harrison, who directed me before the city electrician. I presented myself to that official, who at once called the officer of the Moving Picture Department whom I was charging of unjust treatment. The city electrician also told me that the word "serve" means to work for somebody else, and not for myself. Now shall I go to the City Council, or must I leave Chicago, which has been my home for eleven years?

Section 2 of the Chicago Ordinances passed by the City Council July 13th, 1908, and amended during 1910, reads in part:

It shall be the duty of said Board of Examiners of moving picture operators to examine all applicants for a license as moving picture operators in regard to their several qualifications to operate moving picture machines or devices, and, if found competent, to issue a certificate to said applicant, certifying that he is competent to operate moving picture machines and devices, and such applicant shall then present said certificate to the City Clerk and pay a license fee of ten dollars ($10) to the City Collector, and thereupon the City Clerk shall issue a license to said applicant, etc.

That is all I find in the copy I have of the law. I don't see that the ordinance says anything about "serving," though possibly it has been amended to include that. What I presume has taken place is this: the city has, by ordinance, required that each applicant serve an apprenticeship of one year, and with this proposition, provided it be intelligently and sensibly applied, I most thoroughly and heartily agree. We have had altogether too much of the two-weeks'-experience operator. We can get along without him first rate for the future. However, I believe such rule should be modified to the extent that if a man can show and prove that he has had actual experience in every way equal to the required term of apprenticeship, he should be examined and licensed. Moreover, there is no question in my mind but what the courts would compel the city to license such a man, provided always he could prove his competency and experience. There is only one course open to you, though, and that is to take the matter into the courts, and I very much doubt if you would be the gainer, because Chicago authorities would then doubtless give you an examination that would make the hair on the sphinx curl, although it is made of stone. This is about all the information or assistance I can offer in this matter. I will say, however, that it is a very open question whether your experience, being confined to one machine, and not including any regular theater experience, would really qualify you. Why not go ahead and serve your apprenticeship in Chicago? I believe it will pay you to do it.

From Ohio.

Ohio writes thusly:

As you have requested operators and managers to contribute to the department, I will try to help out a little, though it may be very little indeed. Am operating a motiograph. Was troubled with losing the lower loop, but discovered the difficulty was due to my not paying proper attention to the adjustment of the idler. With the idler set right, there was no further trouble. My take-up belt pulleys became coated with dirt and oil, which caused the belt to stick and produced unnecessary tension. After cleaning the pulleys thoroughly, everything was lovely. I find that just a little bit of vaseline on the tension shoes keeps the machine from running so hard. Doubtless these very things have appeared in the department before, but thought possibly to set them forth again may help some brother after all. Anyway, my intentions are of the best. If you don't think them worth while, there is a waste basket in your office, no doubt. The salt brine stunt didn't work so well with me as with some of the others. I soaked them for three weeks and dried them in the oven for a week. I then tried some and found I had to bring the carbons together quite hard in order to start the arc, which shows that there is more resistance in them than in the untreated carbons. Very likely the salt brine proposition is all right, but for some reason or other, it didn't work out with me. However, I will try it again. I noticed in last week's department that you do not seem to be in favor of correspondence courses; nevertheless, I am taking a course in electricity from the Scranton school, hoping to get a better understanding of that very important part of our work.

I like the sound of this letter. Here is a man who frankly admits that he doesn't know it all, and he is not only willing, but anxious to learn. Moreover, he is willing to spend money in the endeavor to acquire knowledge. Other things being equal, our friend in Ohio will not only keep up with the procession, but several jumps in advance of it. The fact that the arc didn't strike readily does not prove that the carbons, as a whole, have higher resistance after being treated, but that a crust forms on the point which, in itself, has high resistance. I think if you will scrape your treated carbons, where they make contact with the carbon arms, and will also clean the points thoroughly, you will find the arc will strike all right, though it is advised that the carbons be warmed when they are put in, since if warm the arc seems to strike better. Most operators who use the salt soaked carbons keep some lying on top of the lamp house or condenser casing. As to correspondence courses, while I have no doubt that considerable can be gained through them, I doubt their value to the operator. The course in the Scranton school will not, I am afraid, give you much special instruction in the peculiar problems encountered by the operator, though it may give you an intelligent knowledge of electricity as a whole. I am sure but few correspondence school scholars finish their courses. I know of some who have paid for their course in full and yet never completed more than half of it. As to the operators' course presented by a Chicago school I cannot say. I would have to have that entire course sent to me for review before I could either affirm or dispute its value. I think probably you will do well to slack up on the tension springs of your machine by taking a little of the bow out of them.

Getting Acquainted.

Okmulgee, Okla, writes:

Have been a department reader for some time and finally decided to write a few friendly words and get acquainted. I am running with Powers' "Six," taking 110 volts current through a Fort Wayne compensarc, and am getting fine results. Am sending a diagram of how I stopped condenser breakage on my Power's "Six." Cone A is made of thin metal, and is placed between the arc and condenser. This is to keep the cold air from striking the condenser so freely when the lamphouse door is open. There is a two-inch hole to allow the light rays from the arc to enter. There are four half-inch holes at B, top and bottom, to allow cold air to pass through the cone between the arc and condenser, to keep the condenser from getting so hot. The condensing lens itself is then padded with asbestos until it cannot touch metal anywhere. You will note the shape of my condenser, the same being concave on one side and convex on the other. I bought this lens of Eberhard Schneider, New York City, for $2.50, and believe me it is a wonder. It has driven all the ghost away and now I am getting a clean, white light.

Glad to make your long-distance acquaintance, Okmulgee. The condenser stunt looks promising, except for a couple of things, one of which is: how much, if any light, does that cone cut off? You have not said how far it sets back from the arc, therefore I am unable to estimate the amount of light cut off, though I don't believe it will amount to much. As I see it, the opening in cone A should not interfere with a line drawn from the crater to the edge of the condenser at any point. Having remedied this condition, I don't believe much, if any light, will be lost. The other thing I question is the muniscus lens in front. The use of one muniscus lens is very common in Europe, but it is, so far as I know, always placed next the arc. Don't know what the effect would be of placing it the other way.

In the Soup.

St. Marys, Kan., who signs himself "A Disgusted Operator," contributes the following woefully woeful tale of woe:

This is my first letter to the department, therefore excuse mistakes. I am in the soup, and would appreciate your help on the following: Am using 50 amperes a. c. through a Bell & Howell inductor-compensator and cannot get a bright spot. Have tried moving the lamphouse backward and forward and have had my ⅝ cored carbons in every position without results. The noise is something fierce. Would a water resistance device help any? I have an 80-foot throw, use two 7½ condensers, and 5½ e. f. lens. Always have either a blue ghost in the center of the curtain or brown edges. Why is it that most of our films, in passing through the machine, will jump to one side and stay a minute or so, and then a patch comes along and slams it over to the other side, letting the sprocket holes show?

It is difficult to say just what is wrong with your transformer, but the conditions you describe seem to indicate that it is being used on a current of different cycle from that which it was wound for; also the line voltage may be lower than it was designed for. Ascertain from your light company the exact cycle of the current; also make them test the line voltage in the operating room when the machine is in operation, making the test on the primary side of the wires leading to the transformer (the Bell & Howell I mean); then make an exact copy of the wording and figures on the Bell & Howell name plate, and send it, together with the exact voltage and current cycle, to the Bell & Howell Co., 217 W. Illinois Street, Chicago, telling them you are doing this at my suggestion. I think that in this way they will probably be able to tell you just what is wrong and to suggest a proper remedy. Your carbon size is all right, and I believe the ghost is due to the fact that you are not getting current enough. No, you don't want any water resistance device. A rheostat would be very much better than that; but the thing to do is get that transformer working right. I cannot say positively, but believe the trouble with your film jumping from side to side is due to either one of two things (a) Your tension springs spaced too far apart. Set them so that they both bear squarely on the aperture plate track, with the inside edge of the spring even with the inside edge of the track. (b) The tension springs loose so that they wobble from side to side when a patch hits them.

Los Angeles.

Los Angeles has finally waked up, and waked up good and plenty. Within the past week I have had half a dozen letters from members of Local Union No. 150, dealing with the situation in that city. Every one of the writers concedes the truth of the charges as to the farcical examination given applicants for operator's license, but nearly every one of them defends Mr. Manahan, City Electrician, who seems to be, personally, quite popular. We cannot give space to all these letters. We have published a statement from one of the leading officials of Local 150, which I believe covers the case fully. I trust that conditions in the examiners' office will soon be made better. In closing this topic, for the present at least, let me say that the writers deny Mr. Davis's charge that only three union men are getting the scale. According to the letters the union men are all getting the scale, and I trust that this is the actual condition. I have set forth the Los Angeles situation not with the idea of roasting anyone, but simply to call attention publicly to the deplorable state of affairs, to the end that they be remedied, and publicity usually causes the remedying of such conditions, at least to some extent.

From Far Off Australia.

By P. Fulton Preston,

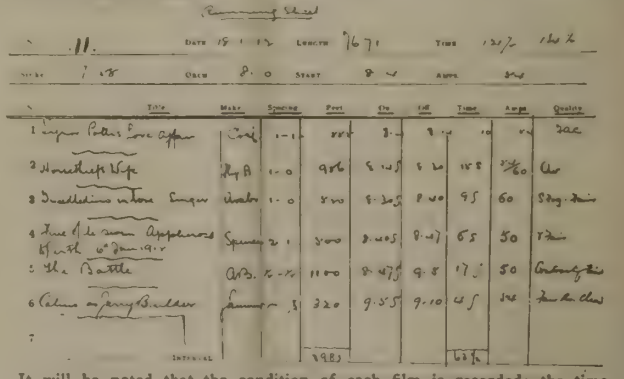
I am taking it for granted that you will extend my screed a welcome. I badly want to say one thing more at least, and that is concerning threading up Power's machine. I must say something nasty about the method given in January 6th, 1912, issue. At the same time I don't want to be dogmatic, or hurt anyone's feelings, so give my own idea of it as follows: Thread top sprocket in usual way, then making a loop of film with fingers of right hand pull it up a little higher than top of top film guard and engage perforations with bottom or take up sprocket with left hand, then carrying the right hand holding the top of film loop back towards lamphouse pull down your bottom loop between the bottom and intermittent sprocket with left hand finger, closing the intermittent idler with the index finger, then bottom roller bracket with little finger thus close the gate. You will notice the right hand does not leave the top loop, and this is the point, to my mind. Anyway it is quicker and much neater (to watch at any rate). I wonder if our own record of changing reels (myself and assistant), on a Pathe has been beaten by much; it is nine seconds time on Edison, one man change, for myself, is 13½ with magazine. I tried soaking the carbons in salt brine, but cannot say I am much in love with it, as it seems to increase the "mist" and gives a ragged spot in some cases. Have tried "Siemens," "Plania" and "Conradty" makes. It also seems that when current approaches near to carbons' capacity, getting them rather hotter than usual, the soaked carbons have a decided tendency to flare. Two years ago I obtained some promising results by impregnating the core of Conradty eighteen m/m carbons (¾ inch.—Ed.), with nitrates of thorium and cerium, derived from a few gross of old gas mantles, but it was a slow process to get them impregnated sufficiently; also very costly. I had to clamp carbons in rubber gasket on end of a cylinder, in which the nitrates in solution were kept under 80 pounds pressure (air). The carbon was heated until it was too hot to bear the hand and the nitrates allowed to percolate through as much as the separation would allow. I have by me a great mass of data concerning arc lamps, photometric measurements of results of variation of carbon sizes, currents, angle of lamp, angle of carbon tip, arc voltage, etc., which I shall be pleased to send along either in original form or tabulated, should you care to have them, or if of interest to any reader. They are the results of about six months intermittent experimenting, and refer to line voltage of 440, 220, 200, 110, 80, 72, and 64 volts, and all currents from 20 to 80 amperes. If time permits, I shall enclose photos of operating room, in which you will notice Pathe dismantled for repairs. In closing I wish you success together with best wishes for the continuation of the high standard of the Moving Picture World.

The Australian brother is heartily welcome, to the department. Let the apology, if any be needed, for the amount of space taken be that Australia does not claim space very often. We have had other letters from there, but it was some time ago. Yes, we can supply back numbers. The price is 15 cents per copy, postpaid, to foreign countries.

I presume the reason you secure the added light brilliancy with Power's Six is that you are using a two-wing shutter, which cuts less light than does the Pathe three-winger. If you use the three-wing shutter there should be but very little difference. If you are showing a 23-foot picture with 30 to 35 amperes, you are using less than 1-10 of an ampere per square foot, and if your screen is of the ordinary type the picture certainly cannot be very brilliant. You ought, in my opinion, with an ordinary screen, to have less than 45 amperes D. C. We are obliged to you for the commutator cleaning compound receipt. Suppose some of the brothers try it out and report. I am rather skeptical as to the use of a file for truing up a commutator, even though the latter be run at high speed and the file be a fine one. Would suggest, if that scheme be tried at all that it be with extreme caution. What friend Preston means, as regards the running of the generator as a motor, is that he cuts a 20 ampere rheostat into the arc circuit and attaches leads from the generator terminals to the carbon arm contacts, which really has the effect of substituting the generator for the arc. Unquestionably such a scheme will work and it is of great value to those having motor-generator sets, since by using it they will be enabled to run their motor with the dynamo end while sandpapering or otherwise dressing up its commutator, but I would imagine the motor would be run at such high speed as to render turning up the commutator impractical. Also it seems to me that 20 amperes is excessive for the purpose. The motor drive is unique. Your scheme for controlling the motor is interesting, but I don't like lamp resistances in operating room. They can be covered up to kill the light, of course, but I think resistance wire is better. We over here, have no trouble stopping the machine quickly enough. There are, of course, various ways of threading Power's Six. Possibly there may be a better method than that described in the article named. Anyhow no one's feelings are in the least hurt. Any one who can show me a better way of doing anything than my way, has my sincere thanks. If I haven't the best way I want to learn it. Your record for threading is excellent, but, frankly, friend Preston, I'm not very much interested in such records. I believe if a man stops his show and is ready to run again (using a single machine) in one minute, he has done all any reasonable manager can ask, and to do even that he ought to have a helper to attend to the lamp; making any needed adjustments. I shall be indeed glad to have the data you mention. Anything which seems to be of value in it will certainly be used.

Friend Preston sends along a "running sheet" showing the record kept of each performance. It appears below. I wonder if it could be duplicated in all the United States.



It will be noted that the condition of each film is recorded; the time it consumed in projection; its length; number of amperes used, and the time it started and stopped. What is meant by "Strike" and "Spacing" I cannot make out. The performance recorded was: Picture 24 feet; throw 120 feet; open air; moonlight; hot summer evening; operating room temperture about 120 Fahrenheit. Come again Australia. The latch-string's always hanging out for you.

Announcement Slides.

Akron, Colo., writes:

Regarding the failure of Mr. Linstruth in using salt brine: I have given the brine proposition a thorough trial, soaking the carbons from three to twenty days, and have always had success. Have used both Electras and Bios, with same result. I believe if Mr. Linstruth will follow these directions carefully he will get results. Make a brine with table salt and cold water, strong enough to float a fresh egg. Soak the carbons four days. Remove from brine and dry thoroughly with a rag. Place a few at a time on top of the lamphouse for two nights. Remove the spot of salt from the tip with a file. It is not necessary to have the carbons warm before using. I sometimes make my announcement slides by writing on gelatine with typewriter and dusting over with bronze powder. Find that it is almost impossible to get good results on account of the bronze adhering to surrounding surface, and if it is wiped off with a cloth it will blur the writing. Do you know the answer? Should presume that the result at arc of 70 volts through rheostats, as per diagram in issue of the 5th instant, would be twenty amperes at a varying voltage, according to distance between carbons.

As to the announcement slides, the answer is very simple: Do not use any bronze, but, instead, use a black typewriter ribbon, and either clear gelatine or gelatine with very light colors. With a good ribbon and a clean typewriter type you will find the writing will be perfectly clear and plain on the screen, without resorting to bronze powder or anything else. If you have to use any powder the best thing is to shove the gelatine into a small box of lamp black while the writing is yet moist. Knock surplus off into box and let dry.

To The Trade

THE Motion Picture Exhibitors League of Greater New York, takes pleasure in extending, by these presents, a cordial invitation to all branches of the motion picture industry, to be its guests at the Second Annual Reception, Entertainment and Ball to be given by the League. The festivities will begin at eight o'clock, Thursday evening, November the fourteenth, nineteen hundred and twelve, at the Palm Garden, Fifty-eighth Street and Lexington Avenue, New York City.

Many pleasant features have been provided by the Entertainment Committee. There will be an exhibition of pre-release photoplays, followed alternately by famous screen stars who will entertain in person. Music for the occasion will be furnished by the orchestra from the New York Hippodrome. The Grand March will be led by Mr. Maurice Costello and Miss Florence Lawrence, and Mr. King Baggot and Miss Alice Joyce. The entire Palm Garden has been engaged and both dance floors will be used. For size and general eclat this gathering will eclipse anything of its kind that has ever been held.

While the function is given by the exhibitors of Greater New York, it is their desire that it be considered a national affair, having as its object the financing of the forthcoming National Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America, to be held in New York City during July, 1913. Tickets are on sale at all New York League photoplay theatres; or the League rooms, 136 3rd Ave., New York. Tickets $1. Extra lady 50c.

Faithfully yours,

The Committee.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE COUNTRY SCHOOL TEACHER" (Lubin).

This is one of the typical Arthur Johnson photoplays. It has given him a role in which he has full sway for the dominating character in which he excels. Mollie Manson is a high strung and magnificent creature, but has never known restraint, and her brother admires and encourages her rebellious spirit. Neil Freeman, a man of determination, takes charge of the village school where previously discipline has not been observed. Freeman, who is a man of large frame and will power, quickly regulates the boys and shows that he is master. Mollie, however, is very troublesome and he cannot use the physical methods to subdue her which he practices on the boys; he must handle her with gentle firmness, which the girl does not respect. One afternoon a stormy scene occurs and Mollie's brother objects to the forceful dictation of the teacher and in a fit of anger strikes Freeman senseless. The sight immediately brings forth the better nature of the girl and she realizes that she is in love with the man she has opposed and thought she hated. Neil had long before loved the girl and as she ministers to him he sees that he has conquered, and made her a creature to be loved and his helpmate for life. The story is mounted with realistic scenery and effects and played by the pick of the Lubin players.

NOVEL WILD WEST FEATURE COMPANY.

In this era of feature films, it takes the genius to think of something different, of something new. This quality of newness, of originality, is one ably possessed by Walter C. Du Brock, the veteran horse-raiser of Illinois. The very line of the stock-breeder's business activities would naturally cause him to lead in the manufacture of Wild West and cowboy features when once entering the film manufacturing game. Not only has Mr. Du Brock equipped himself with a prairie studio at Riverside, Ill., along the banks of the North Branch of the Chicago River on his enormous holdings in this section of the State, but he has also added an invaluable spice of innovation by presenting broncho busting, lariat throwing, target shooting and other Wild West perfections, performed by tiny little children of from four to fourteen years as accurate and as at home on the balking broncho as the surest adult. It is the most marvelous part of his photo production, to see these tottling minors taking part in a Western story true to ranch life in all particulars.

For the leading juvenile-adult role, Mr. Du Brock has selected his own four year old son "Bud," who can throw a steer, rope a horse, ride a broncho, or hit the bull'e eye like an old timer. Then, too, the feminine leads are taken by the proprietor's eleven year old daughter, Melba, acknowledged one of the cleverest young riders in the United States. The other members of his company have been brought from the vast ranch interests that the new manufacturer possesses in Montana and Idaho. The cattle and horses used all belong to Mr. Du Brock and have posed before the motion picture camera many times indeed, serving for the American, Selig and Essanay companies. Furthermore, this stock toured the United States with the Chicago Grand Opera Company in 1911, and Belasco's "The Girl of the Golden West" in 1910. Three of the boys who went through these seasons of experience have been retained for the three reel feature, which will be given the title of "Boys of the Lost River Basin," Walter Barger, Harry Cooper and "Cheyenne" Gray. The leading adult cowboy is none other than DeWitt Gollings, who comes direct from Idaho for this Du Brock film. The "Boys of Lost River Basin" will be sold exclusively on the State right basis.

The new firm will be known as the Du Brock Feature Film Company, with headquarters on Foster Avenue, Chicago. Mr. M. G. Watkins has been appointed manager of this new feature film enterprise.

"KINGS OF THE FOREST."

The call of the wild has its most vivid pictorial exhibition in Selig's latest production, "Kings of the Forest," a play with real heart interest, that has been environed in the wilds of Africa, with the king of beasts as important factors, appearing in the pictures in their natural habit. Not the usual tame and conventional call invested in the exhibits of the so-called trained lions. A wild lion on the game trail is one of the big features that promises to be very thrilling and eminently truthful in holding the very mirror up to nature. There is no flavor of the stuffy museum nor any impress of the cabined animal cage in this big work where the stage has been stocked by nature itself, the cunning of man dividing a play that acts with the big interests whose suspense is accentuated with the unwitting connivance of the man-eaters. This latest and greatest Selig animal masterpiece is in two reels and will be released on November 11th.

"Souls in Torture" (Itala)

THE first picture to be shown to the American public by the Itala Company of America is a two-reel special, "Souls in Torture," and is now ready for shipment. It will be worthy of a hearty welcome—from all points of view. Good people portray this emotional drama, there are good settings, both interior and exterior, and the whole is embellished by excellent photography. Much taste has been displayed in the variation of light and shade. Some of the more notable examples are in the opening scene, in which the two lovers are shown in shadowgraphs, their figures silhouetted against the sky, the two leaning toward each other and separated by a few feet; in the scene where Laura, deserted by her lover in order that she may become the bride of a man able to give her the luxuries and remove her to a clime necessary to restore her health, is taken to the home of the Earl of Aloisi; and in the closing scenes, where Alfred, falsely informed by the Earl that Laura is dead, takes his violin and goes down on the rocks by the pounding surf, the strains from his instrument reaching the ears of Laura and drawing the unhappy wife to the side of her old lover. The last scene is particularly effective. It is artistic. Laura leaves her palatial home, passes out under a great bridge, the roadway adorned with masses of semi-tropical plants, and climbs over the rocks to the spot where Alfred is playing. The rays of the moon are reflected on the surface of the tumbling water.

Alfred and Laura, who have recently fallen in love, attend with some of their young friends a picnic in the woods. By accident Laura meets the Earl of Aloisi, who is smitten and takes great pains to reveal the fact. As the Earl rides away, Alfred, who has seen just enough of the short dialogue to understand the situation, rebukes Laura, but the misunderstanding is shortlived. A couple of months later the Earl meets Laura and invites her to take a ride with him in his machine. Again Aloisi presses his suit, but Laura will give him no encouragement.

As autumn approaches Laura consults a physician. She is in declining health. The doctor informs her that she must have sun and a mild climate for the winter if she is to survive. Laura has not the means. Neither has Alfred. As the doctor imparts this information to Alfred he is heartbroken. The Earl sends to Laura a bouquet, to which is attached a note. Aloisi informs her that if she will go with him to Naples he will see that she gets the attention she needs. Alfred intercepts the note and reads it. He writes the Earl, and tells him that if he will swear to protect Laura he will yield her up. The Earl agrees, and Alfred tells the Earl to be present that evening at the coffee house and he will repudiate Laura.

At the coffee house Alfred is drinking with gay companions. Laura looks on from a distance in horror. As Alfred starts away with his unusual associates Laura speaks to him. He throws her away from him. The Earl, close at hand, takes her to his home. The two are married and go to Naples. There Laura is unhappy. She has the sun and the care she so much requires, but she pines for Alfred. The Earl, disappointed at the deferred convalescence, seeks companionships elsewhere. He joins a gay party bound for a carriage ride. As the men and women leave the vehicle to enter a restaurant Alfred meets the Earl and inquires for Laura. He is informed that Laura is dead. Alfred goes back to the seashore near the home of Aloisi.

Laura is shown in her beautiful home. She is still ill. Looking through some papers, she finds the note of Alfred telling the Earl that if he will promise to care for Laura he will yield her. As she reads the note she hears the strains of the violin down by the sea. She recognizes the instrument and the player. She leaves the house, just able to walk, and makes her way to the side of the player. She reaches out her arms to her old lover, to her only lover; he takes her in his arms. Laura falls to the rocks. Her heart has failed. The shock is too great for the man who has given up his life's love that she might live. He falls by her side.

MR. HUTCHINSON ON ABUSINESS TRIP.

Mr. S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Mfg. Co., is on a business trip to the coast. He will stop at Seattle, Portland, San Francisco and Santa Barbara. At Santa Barbara, where are located the Western Studios of the company, he will arrange for a new series of pictures and lay out a campaign. "Flying A" productions are meeting with such remarkable approbation both here and abroad that the new campaign is necessary to keep pace with the popularity they now enjoy.

MEMBERS OF BATTERY A.

The picture below is a snap shot taken in the reception quarters of the Battery "A" Armory at St. Louis, Missouri, the occasion being the projecting for the first time of the latest Warner's feature entitled "The Raiders of the Mexican Border," in which the entire battery "A" and officers participated. There was in this aggregation at the time the picture was taken, ninety men, one hundred horses, six field pieces and six caissons. Battery "A" is one of the most famous and at the same time, one of the oldest organizations of its kind in existence, it having been formed in 1812. Commanding officers at present are Captain E. O. Sanguient and Lieut. Warner. Other guests present were: Mr. August Froebel of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, Mr. L. D. Kent, Producer, Mr. H. Warner of the Warner's Features, Mr. A. L. Beck and Mr. Ward of the Universal Film Exchange, besides all of the chief principals in the production.

"AN INDIAN'S FRIENDSHIP" (Essanay).

A corking good Western drama is "An Indian's Friendship," released November 9th, with G. M. Anderson in his world-famous role of "Broncho Billy."

Broncho is instrumental in saving Yellow Wolf, an Indian, from the wrath of Dan Runnion, a surly cowpuncher, and Runnion swears revenge. His chance comes when he sees a notice from the county sheriff advising that cattle rustlers are at work and for ranchmen to watch their stock. Finding one of Broncho's shirts out on the clothesline, Runnion places an incriminating note in the pocket and steals away. Getting the ranchman he returns to Broncho's shack and accuses him of being one of the rustlers. The ranchman finds the note in the pocket of Broncho's shirt advising Broncho to come and get his share of the proceeds from the stolen cattle. In a rage he summons his cowboys and Broncho is led away to be hanged. Meanwhile, Yellow Wolf, who has witnessed Runnion writing the incriminating note and heard his threat to get even with Broncho, rides madly to town, summons the sheriff, and they arrive in time to prevent the hanging of Broncho. Yellow Wolf tells his story and the guilty Runnion tries to escape, but is captured and meets his just deserts, while the boys gladly congratulate Broncho on his narrow escape.

Scene from "The Indian's Friendship" (Essanay).

G. M. Anderson is dominant, vigorous and powerful in his world popular role of Broncho, Frederick Church gives a fine portrayal of Yellow Wolf and Brinsley Shaw does the villainish work in the role of Runnion.

GREAT NORTHERN BALKAN WAR PICTURES.

It is announced by the Great Northern Film Company that it will presently issue in a weekly series pictures taken at the scenes of the war between the Balkan states and Turkey now in progress. Elaborate arrangements have been made for this undertaking and a number of cameramen have been engaged. Owing to the undoubtedly large demand for this series of pictures the Great Northern Company announces that orders should be placed before November 5th to insure prompt delivery. Bookings will be made by the Great Northern Film Company at No. 7 East 14th Street, New York City.

THANHOUSER ACTIVITIES.

A fine Thanhouser comedy situation is revealed in the accompanying cut of a scene from "A Noise Like a Fortune," released Sunday, Nov. 10. A young farmer finds it hard to obtain credit wherewith to buy farming implements—until his farmhand spreads a report that his boss has fallen into a large fortune. Immediately the magnate, pictured in auto togs, pushes money and credit galore at the young farmer—and then his daughter's hand along with the gold.

In "The County's Prize Baby," from which a scene is here produced, a senator and his wife separate because she does not dress becomingly enough to meet his circle of friends—she prefers to give her attention to their baby. A year later, the baby and her mother visit a county fair and baby gets "lost." The tot wanders to the pavilion wherein the prize-baby contest is being held, and is seated among the contestants. Her senator father, who is judge of the contest, comes in, fails to recognize his baby daughter, whom he awards the prize—and the mother, searching for the tot, finds her the prize-baby, and finds her husband's love again, too. The release date is Tuesday, Nov. 12.

Scene from "The County's Prize Baby" (Thanhouser).

The scene in "Through the Flames" shows a startling rescue. It is the big moment in a big "fire picture" released Friday, Nov. 8, for which an entire city fire department was turned out.

BOOSTS "CUSTER'S LAST FIGHT" PICTURE.

Mrs. E. B. Colwell, president of the local Board of Censors, who was present at the preliminary exhibition of the three-reel production of "Custer's Last Fight," a historical feature which was produced at the Star Theater, Portland, Oregon, last week, stated openly after reviewing the picture that the Board of Education of that city ought to provide ways and means whereby every scholar in the public schools should see this splendid lesson in history.

UTAH MOVING PICTURE COMPANY.

The Utah Moving Picture Company has been organized with a capital of $100,000 for the purpose of producing a feature subject entitled "One Hundred Years of Mormonism" and other features. The company recently purchased the interests of the Ellaye Moving Picture Company, which had previously undertaken the production of the above-mentioned subject. It is estimated that this picture will cost about $50,000, and it is hoped that it will be ready for distribution within the coming month.

"THEIR CHILDREN'S APPROVAL" (Eclair).

What makes a photoplay is one question, and what saves it is another. Of course what follows by way of comment is only opinion after all, pure theory and nothing more.

Here is an unusual little comedy drama because it takes a very conventional sort of plot and plants it in unusual surroundings and those environs save it from the commonplace. The director has played more than half his story aboard one of the Hudson Day Line steamers to Albany. This very trip up the Hudson, with the views it affords of New York City and Jersey shores, and then up the river to a splendid picturing of West Point make for at least half the interest and pleasure the picture certainly awakens. There are some remarkable bits of photography aboard the boat, such as looking down on the deck and in the dining saloon, with a cleverly contrived depiction of the passing shore line.

Scene from "Their Children's Approval" (Eclair).

Eclair's strong quartette, Alec Francis, Julia Stuart, Lamar Johnstone and Barbara Tennant, enact the story, so it never lags for want of mastery.

The story deals with a Miss Stuart as a widow and her daughter Barbara and opposed, as goes the plot of the tale, is Mr. Francis, with his son Lamar. Francis proposes to Miss Stuart; Mrs. Stuart we should say to be consistent with the narrative; well she accepts, with the exception that they first obtain the consent of their children. The children are apprised of their needed presence at home and both take the boat for Albany, where, by the way, the old folks live. Well, as all stories go, they meet on the boat and fall in love in a sort of to-be-forgotten-when-we-part fashion. Well, the children object at first to a remarriage of their parents, but are soon won over. Now neither nor any of them connect the meeting on the boat with their present situation. There is a happy ending with wedding bells as an accompaniment.

The many friends of Miss Barbara Tennant will be glad to learn that she has recovered from her recent indisposition and is back at work.

RELIANCE-MAJESTIC NOTES.

Mr. George Balsdon, manager of the Photoplay Advertising and Specialty Company of Pittsburg, paid a visit Monday to the Reliance studio to shake hands and lunch with C. Lang Cobb. Before leaving, Mr. Balsdon and Mr. Ritchey had quite a chat along new and progressive advertising lines.

Charles Ranson is now to be seen among the Majestic players—Charlie's face has been a familiar one in Broadway star productions for many years.

Martha McGraw, who played Michael in "Peter Pan," is strengthening Majestic comedies.

The new system of titling instituted by the Reliance Company presents something novel in the construction of motion pictures.

Mrs. Connie Mack, wife of the famous baseball man, is now posing in Majestic comedies under the direction of Charles Weston.

Hopp Hadley, the Majestic scribe, has been appointed a member of the house and entertainment committees of the newly formed Screen Club.

General Manager J. V. Ritchey, of the Majestic and Reliance companies, gave a dinner Tuesday night to his directors, scenario and publicity staff.

Irving Cummings, leading man at the Carlton studios, deserves credit for his work in "Men Who Dare," the Reliance release of October 30th.

ESSANAY WESTERN PICTURES POPULAR.

For the month of November the Essanay Company is releasing twenty-two subjects, seven of which are Western dramas, seven dramas from the Chicago studio and eight delicious comedies from the Eastern players. The Essanay Company is receiving letters galore from exhibitors throughout the country congratulating the inauguration of releasing two Westerns each week. To supply this great demand, Mr. G. M. Anderson and his Western company worked strenuously for the space of several months in producing a number of splendid films to add in the new booking dates. Two new producers have been added to the Western forces by Mr. Anderson, and he is now devoting his entire time to the arranging of his world-famous "Broncho Billy" features.

"THE MIRACLE" IN DEMAND.

A. J. Danziger, president of the New York Film Company, of 12 Union Square, New York City, reports a lively demand for and interest in the big four reel production "The Miracle." New York State has been sold to the Theater Film Company and the True Feature Company have purchased the New Jersey rights. It is stipulated in all contracts, that this production, by reason of its superior class and merits is not to be exhibited in theaters charging a minimum of less than twenty-five cents. This restriction is to be in force in all the States for a period of six months. The musical score for the reels is now completed in every detail.

NEW ATLANTA FEATURE FILM MAN.

Mr. Al Bartlett, a theatrical agent of Atlanta, Ga., has become the representative of the International Feature Film Traders of New York for Atlanta and the South. Mr. Bartlett has turned over his theatrical business to his brother, Lloyd Bartlett.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ENGLAND.

A NEW corporation in Boston, Mass., is the United Amusement Company. This is a $100,000 concern, with the promotors named as E. Howard George, Henry W. Keene, and Margaret E. Quinlen. Nothing is stated as to the amount of cash paid into the treasury, but a general theatrical business is the cause for the new company.

The Alaska-Siberia pictures are being exhibited in Jordan Hall, and a good patronage is being enjoyed. When the writer viewed the reels, the sensational polar bear hunt created intense interest and excitement.

Boston schools are to benefit by the new superintendent, Dr. Franklin B. Dyer, as this gentleman is planning that moving pictures shall play a prominent part in the more extensive use of school buildings. Moving pictures will be shown in the four new evening centers established by the School Board, with the fund set aside for the purpose in connection with lectures it is intended to give for men and women. East Boston, South Boston, Charlestown and Roxbury are included in this departure.

The new theater in Melrose, Mass., has had a most satisfactory opening, and this large up-to-date theater is well on its way to prosperity. The programs consist of vaudeville and photoplays.

October 5 saw the opening of the new Princess Theater, Wakefield, Mass. Special invitations were mailed to managers to be present at that time. All the "trade" who journeyed to Wakefield, were rewarded by seeing a fine theater, modern in every way, and seating about 1,000. The Princess has had a prosperous career; in fact, it has been necessary to increase the seating capacity several times. Pictures, songs, and high-class singing acts are to be given. Manager Hodgdon may well be proud of the result of his efforts.

Frank L. Browne is no longer to be seen managing the Shawmont Theater, Roxbury, Mass. Mr. H. O. Chenowith, the well known moving picture manager, is now guiding the Shawmont. It is rumored that Manager Browne has "hooked up" with Gordon's Chelsea, Mass., Theater.

The Odell Opera House, of Franklin, N. H., has a new owner and manager in the person of Abe Marcus, that well-known and liberal manager of Manchester, N. H. Since October the Opera House has been exhibiting the Film Supply programs, which are booked through the Boston office of the Mutual Film Corporation. The vaudeville is supplied by the Variety Amusement Company of Boston.

Mrs. Acker, one of the heads of a chain of Canadian theaters, bearing her name, visited Boston recently, and looked over the picture and vaudeville situation. Manager Greenberg, of the New Gem Theater, East Boston, gave a special performance in Mrs. Acker's honor.

Manager P. L. McMahon, of the Keeney Theater, New Britain, Conn., is having quite a rumpus with the White Rat Actors' Union. The latter claim that Mr. McMahon deals unfairly with his vaudeville talent and complain that the theater "trims" the acts out of a portion of their regular salaries by different ways. The affair is being looked into by the Union.

The Famous Players' Film Company of New England, with offices at 597 Washington Street, Boston, is very busy working in the interests of the new Sarah Bernhardt reels of "Queen Elizabeth."

The Marcus Loew people state that the Boston vaudeville booking offices of their concern are to be re-established.

The Empire Theater, Pittsfield, Mass., has finally decided to give stock company attractions this winter, with vaudeville and pictures to follow, provided the pulling powers of the former entertainment are not up to expectations.

The employees of Poli's Theater, Springfield, Mass., presented Manager Stephen J. Breen with a gold watch, as an appreciation of his square dealing. Mr. Breen has been transferred to the Poli Theater, of Bridgeport, Conn. Mr. Gordon Wrighter succeeds Manager Breen.

The American Amusement Company has incorporated at Waterbury, Conn., with a capital of $8,000. Mr. Rosen, formerly associated with Mr. S. Z. Poli, is the prime mover. The concern will operate moving picture theaters.

Messrs. Gerken and Schabel are to build a structure on State Street, New Haven, Conn., and a portion of the property will be used as a theater, playing to picture programs.

Mr. John Forting is in Portland, Me., and is now having a theater erected at Central and Main Streets, Portland, Me.

The Howard Theater, Boston, exhibited moving pictures of the boxing contest between Ad Wolgast and Joe Rivers for the lightweight championship. The reel was shown the entire week of October 7, and created interest among the sporting fraternity.

To satisfy a popular demand the "Durbar in Kinemacolor" was put on for two weeks more at Tremont Temple, Boston, starting October 7. These reels had been on exhibition at Tremont Temple for several months, and were removed to allow the Coronation pictures to play a return engagement. On October 21, the Kinemacolor presented Laurence Grant in a series of moving pictures, entitled "Through Yellowstone National Park." Tremont Temple is virtually the Kinemacolor house of Boston, as these pictures are being exhibited there continually. Business is always good, and at prices that range upwards to one dollars.

The Kinemacolor folks also exhibited pictures of the "Red Sox"-"Giants" baseball games, taken in natural colors. These pictures were exhibited the latter part of the week of October 6, in addition to the Durbar pictures.

A number of New England cities have had more or less trouble with the local Musicians' Union, and now the exhibitors of Springfield, Mass., are in receipt of a letter from their union, demanding that the orchestras in these theaters be increased, according to their seating capacities. The Union is also issuing a wage scale that calls for $20 weekly for men working not over 36 hours weekly. The leader must get $25 weekly. The scale for pianists is as follows: 55 cents an hour for 36 or more hours a week, and for less than 36 hours, a rate of 75 cents an hour is called for. Double pay is demanded for overtime. The Union also feels that it is their right to say how many musicians a house of given capacity should employ, and have issued this schedule: Houses seating 400 to 700, two men; houses seating 700 to 1,000, 4 men; theaters holding 1,000 to 1,500, 5 men, and theaters exceeding 1,500 must employ 6 men.

A reasonable time has been granted the Springfield houses to arrange their plans according to these rules, with the statement that steps will be taken to enforce this schedule if the houses refuse to comply. A similar statement was issued some time ago in Brockton, Mass., and houses were known to have cast out their entire musical programs, rather than give in to the Musicians' Union demands.

Mrs. E. C. Farrington, of Littleton, N. H., has opened her new Princess Theater, at Brattleboro, Vt. The house, which is cozy and up-to-date, is playing to vaudeville and pictures. Business is reported as satisfactory.

Keith's Theater, Pawtucket, R. I., which has been giving vaudeville and picture programs on a 3 a day schedule, has decided to cut the number of shows down to two. The supper show, given between 5 and 7 P. M., never paid for itself.

Mr. William Fox is actively pushing his way into the New England territory, and has now gained a strong foothold there. A beautiful theater, modern and up-to-date in every way is soon to be ready for Mr. Fox in Waterbury, Conn. This house will seat 2,400. A new house in Holyoke, Mass., is another Fox house soon to be ready. The Nelson Theater of Springfield, Mass., is being thoroughly overhauled and improved, and will soon be presenting the Fox brand of vaudeville and pictures.

On the night of October 8, Wallace O. Gould and his wife, were injured in an automobile ride, on a return trip to Lewiston, Me., from Lisbon Falls. The automobile made the trouble at Westbrook, Me., having turned turtle, throwing Mr. Gould beneath the auto. Mrs. Gould escaped serious injury, but Mr. Gould, who is manager of the Pastime Theater, Brunswick, Me., was seriously cut and bruised.

The Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals is preparing to extend the field of humane education and moving pictures have rightly been chosen as the medium. By object lessons, the officials of this society believe that many people who could not be reached otherwise can be instructed, and their sympathies toward animals aroused. Moving pictures are to be made at once showing the work at the stock-yards, ambulance service, the "feed-bag" evil and other things. President F. H. Rowley has determined on a wide and far-reaching campaign, and it is his postive intention to get the reels in every moving picture theater in Massachusetts. Mr. Rowley feels that the campaign is novel, but that it will do the greatest amount of good on this very account. It seems entirely probable that a series of moving pictures will make people understand the value to themselves of humane treatment to their own animals.

Mr. S. L. Poli announces that he will build a new theater in Springfield, Mass. The location chosen is the property on the north side of Worthington Street, near Main Street. Mr. Poli intends to start a week early next year, and expects to spend the best part of $450,000 before he gets through. Plans have been made and passed by Mr. Poli. The plans were made by Brown and Van Buren, and call for an absolutely fireproof building. It will be a reinforced concrete, iron and steel building. The lobby will be 36 feet by 96 feet in depth, while the auditorium will be 140 feet by 105. This will easily permit of a seating capacity of 3,500. Everything going to make up a first-class theater will be incorporated in the new house, such as complete ventilating, cooling, heating, and vacuum cleaning systems. Mr. Poli says that this announcement is but a sample of what he intends doing in the near future. In Waterbury, Conn., and Hartford, Conn., a similar procedure is promised.

The Bijou Theater, Naugatuck, Conn., was scheduled for its opening on September 20, and reports good business since then. Manager S. Rosen is an old hand at this business, having been connected with S. Z. Poli for some years.

St. John, Canada, seems to be a good city for B. F. Keith Theaters, and there soon will be two houses showing Keith attractions there. The Nickle, the old Keith house, is doing very nicely with pictures as the main attraction. A large modern and thoroughly fireproof theater is now well under way for Mr. Keith in St. John, and Mr. J. H. Clancey, chief engineer of the Keith houses in Massachusetts, is on the spot, looking out for the construction. The house was originaly intended to be open this month, but delays in building will not allow the new house to be completely furnished until next March. The theater has been named the Imperial and is expected to be one of the finest in Canada. Under the foundations of the Imperial a great amount of water has been discovered, and this accounts for the delay.

The Crown Theater, a moving picture house of Bridgeport, Conn., is to be thoroughly overhauled and renovated, in order to keep pace with competition.

The old Jolliette Theater, Boston, which was closed for some months, due to poor business, has reopened under the name of the Empire. Licensed pictures and songs are given, with admission at 5 cents, except on Saturday and Sundays, when 10 cents is asked. The house is not doing very much and cannot be expected to prosper, as nearby houses are too strong competition for the Empire, which is an old house, of a type that has outlived its usefulness.

The Academy Theater, a moving picture house of Magerstown, Me., is to be enlarged, as Manager C. W. Boyer needs additional room to seat his patrons.

The Princess Theater now under construction in Hartford, Conn., will add one more moving picture theater in that city. It will be a cozy house, and should get a share of the trade.

Mr. A. A. Kellmann is becoming quite a factor in the New England section, and has now taken the lease on the Park Theater, of Taunton, Mass. This is the best theater in the city, and should make a winner for Mr. Kellmann.

An orchestrarian has been installed in the Central Square Theater, Lynn, Mass., by Manager James Donovan. This is probably the first theater in New England to introduce a mechanical orchestra. The house is doing very well, indeed, with programs of pictures and songs.

The Opera House, Exeter, N. H., is now the possession of the Goldstein Brothers' Amusement Company of Springfield. The concern which operates a number of New England theaters found trade so good at the Exeter Opera House that they decided to buy it, rather than continue to run the house on a lease.

The Famous Players Film Company of New England, with headquarters in Boston, lost no time in booking the Sarah Bernhardt pictures of "Queen Elizabeth" at the Jefferson Theater, Portland, Me. The reels were shown to enthusiastic and large audiences, during the week of October 7.

John T. Moriarty, of Springfield, Mass., states that he has just purchased the Potoin estate, in Holyoke, Mass. ,and that a moving picture theater will be operated there, as soon as some needed alterations are made. This location is a good one, and should prove a money-maker for Mr. Moriarty, who expects to manage the house himself.

Mr. M. Douglas Flattery, who is the secretary and counsel for the Marcus Loew Theaters in Boston, is in charge of the Carnegie Museum Alaska-Siberia pictures in that city. The reels are doing so well at Jordan Hall, that a six-week engagement is planned. The pictures may be shown in all the Loew houses in New England.

New Haven, Conn., exhibitors are showing themselves to be alive to the benefits of organization, and accordingly, have formed what is known as the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New Haven. The New Haven exhibitors are intending to enlarge their scope of work, so as to include the entire State of Connecticut. The immediate cause of this organization is to attempt various political candidates for office to declare absolutely what their ideas are regarding a Sunday opening for theaters. The new organization will throw its strength to the men favoring Sunday opening, and will aid their cause via the screen. This would seem to be the most effective possible way for Connecticut exhibitors to get what they are looking for, and every moving picture man in that state is strongly urged to get in line at once. Just get in touch with the officers of the new organization, who are Mr. John Gentile, president; Mr. J. Fahy, treasurer, and Mr. J. J. Cannon, who is vice-president.

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Lemieux, formerly proprietors of the Orpheum Theater, Springfield, Mass., who were forced into bankruptcy last spring, have sold their theater to S. B. Brown, a Providence, R. I., man, who will run the house as a straight photoplay house. Recently the Orpheum had been operated by Mr. Daniel J. McGrath. The Orpheum will be renovated before Mr. Brown takes hold.

HENRY.

One of the oldest churches in Pittsfield, Mass., is soon to be converted into a moving picture theater. For years the Unity church has stood on North Street. Business blocks sprung up around the edifice as the city grew, and the church has been sold to William T. Butter, who announces that he plans to remodel it and to put in a brick addition, converting it into a modern business block and moving picture theater. The location is an excellent one, and the new theater should do well.

The writer dropped into the new Huntington Avenue Theater, Boston, recently, and found that this cosy house is becoming popular. This was attested by the large audience. It was an afternoon performance, and many women and children were present. The projection was even, and the musical selections very pleasing. Manager Jones is giving away free a box of chocolates to everyone attending the matinee performances, until further notice, in order to increase the interest in the afternoon shows. Manager Jones has an unusually good orchestra, called the Huntington Theater Ladies' Orchestra, and their musical selections were well received.

The Auditorium Theater, which was recently opened by Mr. Raymond McBride in Bridgeport, Conn., is doing very well. The Auditorium is a neat, cosy house, and exhibits a good grade of pictures from the Mutual folks.

The new Park Theater of Manchester, N. H., is giving stock-company attractions this year.

Mutual service seems to completely suit the Lyceum Theater of New London, Conn. Manager W. T. Murphy is greatly pleased with the way his new pictures are being received.

The work on the building of the new theater on Tremont Row, Boston, mysteriously ceased last week, and many rumors are in circulation to account for it. Some say that arrangements have been concluded whereby it will not be necessary to build the temporary theater, while waiting for existing leases to expire. Owing to the inability of the promoters to buy the lease of one of the tenants, it was impossible to build the big theater, and a smaller one was under way to bridge the time until the lease of this tenant expired. Another rumor is to the effect that the Fire Commissioner had ordered the work stopped, until certain things were fixed to his liking. Many believe this story, as the building is one of the oldest in the city. The writer does not vouch for either rumor, which cannot be confirmed.

Mr. Jack Dolan, manager of the Lyric Theater, Dover, N. H., has finally recovered from an illness that kept him away from business for more than a month. His many friends will be glad to learn that Jack is on the job once more.

Mr. William Haddock visited Boston this week in the interests of Eclair films. Mr. Haddock made a most favorable impression on all he happened to meet.

Mr. Robert Evans certainly knows how to lecture the pictures and he never showed to better advantage than at Jordan Hall, Boston, where he is explaining the Alaska-Siberia pictures. These pictures are doing nicely under the management of Mr. M. Douglas Flattery, a Marcus Loew representative.

Mr. Frank Howard, one of the owners of Gordon's Olympia Theater, Boston, is most enthusiastic over the showing of that house.

Mr. A. A. Kellmann opened the Park Theater, Taunton, Mass., which he has just leased, with a rush. The opening attraction was the Nat Goodwin reels of "Oliver Twist." Business was good and Mr. Kellmann will no doubt make a winner out of his new house, which formerly was the "legitimate" house of the city.

Mr. W. T. Howley, manager of the Premier Theater, Lowell, Mass., reports that he has found business satisfactory since his opening, October 11. A program of independent pictures is used.

Mr. Jeffrey L. Whalen is making a big hit with Lynn, Mass., audiences, where he is lecturing the pictures at the Olympia Theater, which is managed by Arthur E. Lord.

Howe's moving pictures are booked to play the Court Square Theater, Springfield, Mass. This is a "legitimate" house as a rule, but Manager D. O. Gilmore finds it expedient to run in a feature film production now and then.

The Goldstein Brothers Amusement Company have secured the services of Mr. A. H. Furrows as manager of their Plaza Theater, Northampton, Mass.

The Star Theater, Nantasket, Mass., opened with a rush on Friday evening, October 18. This house is open on Tuesday and Friday nights, and did very well last year on the same policy. Manager Thomas L. Donahue has selected to use the service of the Mutual Film Corporation and vaudeville from the Variety Amusement Company of Boston.

William Braley of St. John, Canada, announces that he will have a new theater, to be devoted to vaudeville and pictures, at Yarmouth, N. S. Mr. Braley has put about $15,000 into the renovation and improvement of Odd Fellows' Hall and now has a modern theater. With a seating capacity of over 1,000, and a good ocation, Braley's Theater should find no trouble in doing a good volume of business in Yarmouth.

The Opera House, Hudson, Mass., opened on Monday, October 14, with a first-class service from the New England Universal Film Exchange of Boston, and with vaudeville from the Variety Amusement Company. Manager Ascher reports good business.

A new theater, to be devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville, is slated for Hartford, Conn., as Messrs. Lewis and Harvey intend to build one.

There's liable to be a fight between the vaudeville and picture theaters of Lynn, Mass., and the local Musicians' Union. The latter now demands that musicians be paid $3 a week more than their present wages. The leader must get a $4 boost. The local houses do not seem disposed to "come across" to this extent, and there may be some trouble. The Musicians' Union is very aggressive in the interests of its members.

The new Poli Theater, on Elm Street, Worcester, Mass., started off with a tremendous rush. Joseph C. Criddle, the manager, states that his "million-dollar theater" is cleaning up the city with its big bills of vaudeville and pictures.

The Colonial Theater, Lawrence, Mass., found no difficulty in crowding its house during the week of October 14, with the Sarah Bernhardt reels of "Queen Elizabeth" as the attraction. Prices were 10, 20 and 30 cents.

The Lowell Opera House exhibited Sarah Bernhardt in "Queen Elizabeth" during the week of October 21, and prices ranged from 10 to 50 cents.

HENRY.

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

ASTRONOMERS of Decatur, Ill., have formed a society and have made arrangements with the Bijou Theater to show slides in that house once a week and to furnish a lecturer.

Wilbur and Robert Inman have leased the Midget Theater at Belvidere, Ill., for Saturday picture shows.

Kewanee, Ill., now has six moving picture shows. Ed. Feldon and Frank Greenway have opened the Bijou on Main Street, and the American, on Chestnut Street, has been opened.

The city council of Streator, Ill., has passed a stringent ordinance regulating the operation of moving picture machines. The measure creates the Bureau of Examiners of Moving Picture Operators, consisting of the city electrician, chief of fire department and chief of police. A license fee of $3 a year is charged. Proprietors are allowed to operate twenty-four hours in emergencies without a licensed operator.

Edward Vanden of Marion, Ill., and H. H. Mehlin, of Winchester, Ohio, have purchased the Star and Majestic theaters at Mt. Vernon, Ill., from Frank Gillespie, Ray Carroll and Homer Hicks.

The Selig film "The Coming of Columbus," was shown October 14 and 15 at Dreamland Theater, at Kewanee, by Santa Maria Council Knights of Columbus.

Licensed pictures are being used in the Grand Opera House at Charleston, Ill.

J. C. May, who recently opened a moving picture show in the opera house at Franklin, Ill., has removed to the Hocking Building. A dynamo has been installed in a nearby building to furnish power. Miss G. Reinbach is ticket seller and Edna McDougall is usher.

Plans to open a moving picture show in the Lewis Opera house at Bluffs, Ill., did not materialize because of prohibitive insurance rates.

Heloy Woods is now singer, and Mrs. Walter Van Winkle pianist, at the Lyric, at Avon, Ill.

W. W. Watts, owner of the Vaudette at Springfield, Ill., is not connected with the new house at Jerseyville, Ill.

All houses in Springfield, Ill., reported a good business during State Fair week, although the attendance at the big exposition was not up to former years, owing to threatening and rainy weather. The raise in prices from five to ten cents, was justified by an increase to three reels. The Universal Portland Cement Company of Chicago, used industrial pictures to show concrete road construction, and although they had only a small booth, had 3,000 visitors a day. The Rudolph Wurlitzer Company had a special exhibit of orchestral pianos for moving picture theaters at 407 East Jefferson Street.

Earl Smith of Lewistown, Ill., has purchased the Dreamland Theater at Farmington, Ill., from H. W. Cross. He will be assisted in the management by Donald Elliott, also of Lewistown.

The remodeled Bijou Theater at Rochester, Ill., was reopened October 12 by Faust & Demblon. A new No. 6 A Power's camerograph has been installed.

Arthur and Horace Heaton of White Hall, Ill., have stored their tent for the winter and will play opera houses with their moving picture show.

Peterson & Kempk of Chicago, have leased Lundenburg & Shanno's hall at Kirkland, Ill., and will devote three nights to moving pictures and vaudeville and three nights to roller skating.

Thomas Keyes of Chicago, has leased The Barrymore Theater at Moline, Ill., and will open a picture show there.

The Steamer Francis A, with barge, has left Davenport, Ia., for a winter cruise of the South, going through the Hennepin canal and down the Illinois river. Moving pictures will supplement vaudeville. The performance is being given in a tent.

George Vampaketes is said to be contemplating opening a moving picture show in Upper Alton, Ill.

The Dearborn Theater Company of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $10,000, to do a general theatrical and amusement business. The incorporators are: Charles Goodman, Mary Lee Colbert and Lee J. Frank.

Claude Kay is now soloist at the Crystal Theater in Waterloo, Iowa.

Moving pictures showed L. B. Jones, former Mayor of Marshalltown, Iowa, how the city has grown during the long years that he lay helpless in bed. Jones was chief of police at the time Clyde W. Morse, who promoted the Marshalltown films, was a reporter on a morning paper. In order to give his old friend a chance to see the sights of the city, Morse stretched a canvas upon a residence adjoining the Jones home and the former Mayor witnessed the pictures from an easy chair at the window. Joseph Moore furnished the machine, and the Colonial contributed some of the views and the operator. The Lyric sent a pianist and some films, while the Princess and Isis also loaned films. A crowd of three hundred persons saw the novel exhibition.

Arthur Sweetman has been secured as manager for the Irwin Theater Company, at St. Charles, Ill.

The new Grand Opera House, seating 850 people, has been opened at Plano, Ill.

A contract has been let to John Kurtz to construct the Orpheum Theater at Marshalltown, Ia., to cost $12,700.

Photoscenes of the picturesque Mississippi river between Elsah and Grafton, Ill., will be made, the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Railway loaned a coach, engine and crew for the purpose.

E. G. Wolcott, general secretary of the Y. M. C. A. at Sioux City, Ia., advocates the installation of a moving picture machine.

J. O. Canfield has disposed of his two moving picture shows at Washington, Ia., to Crilden & Marshall of Hampton, Ia., and will go to California.

A new moving picture show, to be known as the Lyric, has been opened in the Joplin Building at Johnson City, Ill.

Moving Pictures of the International Typographical Union Home at Colorado Springs, Colorado, were shown October 17, at the Lyric theater in Springfield, Illinois, under the auspices of the local printers union.

The Gem and the Princess moving picture shows at Beardstown, Ill., played a prominent part in the entertainment features of the annual State Convention of the Illinois Supervisors, County Clerks, and Commissioners Association.

Mabin Brothers have been granted permission to conduct a moving picture show every Sunday evening in the Village Hall, at Averyville, a suburb of Peoria, Illinois.

The city council of LaSalle, Illinois, has revoked two ordinances, one limiting the number of picture shows and another forbidding the establishing of a theater on the north side of First street, between Gooding and Joliet streets. This action was taken in order to allow Peter Mackiney and Thomas Whitfield to open a new photoplay house on First street.

The Ogden Theater Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $2,500. The incorporators are, Edgar Edson, Arthur L. Miller, Flora F. Edson.

Moving picture theater proprietors of Mattoon, Illinois, have begun a movement to have their houses open on Sunday.

F. H. MADISON.

LOUISVILLE.

MANAGER DAVE LEVINSON, of the Novelty Theater, is contemplating the use of a vocalist in his house. Mr. Levinson has not in the past been a believer in the use of singers, believing that the public appreciates high-class films more than anything else. However, the exhibitor is inclined to give the proposition another chance, and is prepared to keep an accurate record of attendance figures during the time the innovation is in use. If attendance increases, the vocalist will be retained; otherwise, it will be discontinued.

John W. Timmons, who had gained some prominence in moving picture circles around Louisville as a singer, died recently, after a week's illness. Death was due to paralysis. Mr. Timmons is survived by three daughters.

Miss Mabel Normand's appearance at the Crystal Theater in Louisville, drew large crowds, that talented actress appearing to good advantage in one of the Keystone Film Company's pictures.

The Home Motion Picture Company has been incorporated at Muncie, Ind., with a capitalization of $30,000. The directors of the new company are: Harry R. Wysor, Burt H. Whitely and C. Ray Andrews. The company plans to manufacture films, industrial and educational in character.

President Irvin Simon, president of the Princess Amusement Company, of Louisville, and manager of the Consolidated Theaters Company, attended the opening of the latter's new house, the Empress, in Central City, Ky., recently. The new theater opened under the most favorable auspices, according to the manager. The house in Central City is the second to be opened since the Consolidated began operations. That at Earlington, Ky., is doing nicely.

Following the lead of numerous other schools throughout the country, the Cardome School, of Georgetown, Ky., has installed a moving picture machine for first aid to the teachers in instructing pupils. Educational and other films will be shown, and the innovation is expected to prove a brilliant success.

The Latta Optical Company of Louisville, has taken on a line of home moving picture machines. Demonstrations have been given daily by the company at its quarters at Fourth and Chestnut Streets.

Pictures being used by the Anti-Tuberculosis Society at Cincinnati, O., in an anti-tuberculosis campaign, are not to be shown outside of that city, according to a recent announcement. The films caused quite a flurry in the Queen City and were responsible for liberal donations, to be used in the fight against the great white plague. The Chamber of Commerce, however, feared that if exhibited outside of Cincinnati that city would be given a "black eye," and accordingly it was decided not to use them elsewhere. "Darkest Cincinnati," is the title of the pictures, which portray conditions in the slums of that city.

The new Woodward Theater, to be erected at Webster and Main Streets, Cincinnati, will be constructed by the Ohio Building & Construction Company. It was planned by Architects Rapp, Zettel & Rapp.

The Rex Theater opened to the Hopkinsville, Ky., public late in October. The house was built by the Rex Amusement Company, and is one of the handsomest in Hopkinsville. Moving pictures are shown.

The Bonita Theater, Chattanooga, Tenn., has been taken over by T. C. Thompson and F. B. Holt. It was formerly controlled by the Mountain City Amusement Company. Mr. Thompson, who was at one time manager of the Colonial Theater of Chattanooga, will have charge of the Bonita. Extensive improvements will be made in the house before the opening of the Winter Season. The new owners have broken away from licensed pictures, and in future will use Universal service. Three reels will be shown, with a daily change.

Louisville exhibitors and musicians have as yet failed to reach an agreement, and the former have continued to arrange for music from other sources. Max Simons, owner of the Olympic Theater, recently installed a Wurlitzer piano in that house. The Ideal and East Broadway theaters, controlled by the Broadway Amusement Company, are others which provide their patrons with Wurlitzer music.

The striking musicians are calling the public's attention to the controversy between themselves and exhibitors in numerous ways. The union musicians recently attempted to blackmail the East Broadway Theater at Shelby Street and Broadway, by stationing a union band outside the place and rendering several stirring airs. Residents from several blocks distant came to hear the performance. Following the concert the unionists exhorted the big crowd to stay away from the theater. The throng, impelled by some perverse instinct, however, had distinctly different plans, and Manager Louis Steurle, of the Broadway Amusement Company, who had expected an unusually light attendance, was amazed to find the crowd clamoring for tickets and he showed to the largest audience of his career. The union men have adopted the plan of parading the streets of Louisville, carrying a banner reading, "Help the locked-out musicians." The strikers also have had printed many thousands of dodgers, red ink being used, giving their side of the argument. The musicians complain that because the exhibitors won't give in, causing the union men to strike, the moving picture owners have "gone so far as to put in electric pianos and organs to tentertain you." The cause of the strike is the wish of the exhibitors to insert in contracts with the musicians, a two-weeks' clause, allowing them to terminate the contract in that length of time. The musicians demand at least a three-months' contract.

Mrs. Olive Shaarf, vocalist at the Majestic Theater, Louisville, has made a strong appeal to patrons by rendering classical offerings, "Il Trovatore," and others of similar beauty being among her favorites. The acquisition of Mrs. Schaarf seems to bear out the reputation of Manager Louis J. Dittmar as being one of the shrewdest exhibitors in the country. Mr. Dittmar has followed the public tastes closely, and has about reached the conclusion that high-class vocal offerings will soon replace the ragtime stuff which has had such a run recently.

The health authorities of Jeffersonville, Ind., have lifted the ban from moving picture houses in that town. For a time, children were barred because of a diphtheria epidemic. This has now been practically eliminated by the authorities, and children may again enjoy the pleasures afforded by the motion picture theaters.

The Mutual Film Corporation has taken offices in Cincinnati, having leased the two upper floors of 17 Opera Place.

After successfully operating an airdome during the past summer, A. L. Smith has opened a new motion picture theater in Owensboro, Ky. The new theater will be open from 11 o'clock in the morning until the same time at night. The new house is well equipped with modern conveniences, among them being an exhaust fan that will completely change the air every three minutes. The house is located at 315 Fredericka Street.

Freeman Owen, a cameraman, who recently took pictures of the animals of the Cincinnati, O., zoo, should have had a machine focused on him while so doing, according to stories of the adventure. Owen found that satisfactory work could not be by taking the animals through the wire screens, so he entered the cages. Some of the animals watched him in lazy unconcern, but others resented the intrusion and made life very interesting for the cameraman before he completed his task.

G. P. Balch of the Louisville Courier-Journal, recently was one of the speakers before the Boosters' Club of the New Albany, Ind., public service companies. He gave a good talk on "Motion Pictures and their Value as an Advertising Medium." Mr. Balch gave full credit to the pictures as an important factor in modern advertising campaigns. Mr. Balch is president of the Municipal and Commercial Film Manufacturing Company, which recently made pictures of the interurban line, connecting Louisville with New Albany. The pictures were shown at the recent meeting of the Boosters' Club.

H. A. Moore, representing the Consolidated Theaters Company, has taken offices in the Tyler Building, Louisville. Mr. Moore will have charge of the Consolidated's interests in Louisville, besides doing some field work for the corporation. The concern now has two theaters in operation, one each at Earlington and Central City, Ky. It is planning others in accordance with its intention of establishing a long chain through Kentucky, Tennessee and Southern Indiana.

"Cy" Reinhardt, son of the well-known singer of that name, is following in his father's footsteps by working in Louisville moving picture houses. Young Cy is possessed of his father's ability to a marked extent, and has a promising future, it is believed.

The Louisville Photoplay Association has presented a check for $60 to the Salvation Army, which is to begin work on a new home in Louisville shortly. Moving picture men have been liberal contributors to the project, while the Association, including practically all of the exhibitors, also has helped largely.

The Ideal, the Broadway Amusement Company's new house at Twenty-first and Market Streets, is drawing big crowds daily, refuting predictions to the effect that the theater could not survive because of the lack of transient trade. The house is drawing patronage from Rowan Street to Broadway, and from Eighteenth Street to the outskirts of the city on the west side. The faith of Fred Dolle and others of the Broadway is being vindicated by the success of the new house, which compares favorably with any in the country in beauty and excellence of productions.

The spread of diphtheria in Covington, Ky., has been checked, and children of that city will shortly be allowed to resume attendance at moving picture houses and other public places. The schools, which have been temporarily closed, are to be reopened, the health officials having the epidemic well in hand.

The East Broadway Theater has discontinued vaudeville, pending the settlement of the strike, and will give straight moving pictures until that time. Louis Steurle is manager of the house, which is operated by the Broadway Amusement Company.

The next annual meeting of the Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League will be held in Louisville April 22, 23 and 24, according to an announcement by the Executive Committee, which met in Louisville recently. The next meeting of the executive body will take place at Covington on January 5. President J. H. Stamper, of Lexington, Ky., presided at the recent gathering, which was held at the Seelbach Hotel. Others present included L. H. Ramsey, of Lexington; D. C. Oldham, of Richmond; L. C. Smith, of Owensboro; J. C. Cairlo, of Covington, and Louis J. Dittmar, of Louisville. The 1912 meeting of the organization was held at Lexington. It was reported that the Kentucky Motion Picture Exhibitors' League now numbers 125 members, including every exhibitor in Kentucky of importance. Efforts are to be put forth to enroll the few who are not now affiliated with the state body.

Robert S. Schrader, general manager of the Central Film Exchange of Indianapolis, Ind., was a recent visitor to the Louisville branch of that company, which is in charge of A. F. Mayer. Mr. Schrader expressed deep satisfaction with recent developments. The Louisville head of the company has received a heavy shipment of reels, said to be one of the largest ever handled by a branch house in the South. Mr. Mayer is now providing features for the Broadway Amusement Company of Louisville, that concern staging numerous Bison films, which have proven especially popular with its clientele. The Louisville office of the Central will serve the Consolidated Theaters Company, which has opened two new houses in Kentucky. The latest of these is the Empress, which has been thrown open to the Central City, Ky., public with a seating capacity of 400. Thomas Murphy is in charge. The Louisville office has increased its film buying from 21 to 26 reels weekly, adding Ambrosio features.

The Princess Amusement Company of Louisville will shortly present pictures of the world's series between New York and Boston to Louisville devotees of the national pastime. Pathe films will be used.

Louisville musicians will give a benefit ball in the near future. The funds will go to those who have left their work in moving picture houses.

The Advance Film Manufacturing Company, recently formed in Louisville, began operations by photographing the International Convention of the Disciples of Christ, which held its annual gathering in the Kentucky metropolis recently. The convention was attended by several thousand delegates from all parts of the world. The pictures were made while the meeting was in progress at the Armory. The Advance also has taken animated pictures of the Twenty-third Indiana State Guards, on a practice march from Indianapolis to French Lick. Ernest Carpenter, who acts as cameraman, took the regiment while it was passing through Franklin, Ind. Simon and Michael Switow and Ernest Carpenter are stockholders.

The Independent Film Service Company has been incorporated in Louisville, being a continuation of a going concern. D. B. Baker, former owner, is president of the company, which has a capitalization of $10,000. J. J. Petman, who has taken a half-interest in the concern, is vice-president, and Miss B. A. Plessiger is secretary and manager. The present quarters at 418 West Jefferson Street, will be retained.

The Heuck's Theater Company, which will build, equip and control moving picture theaters, has been incorporated in Cincinnati with a capital stock of $18,000. C. H. Walter, Emma and Matilda H. Heuck, and Charles E. Weber, are its incorporators.

Nov. 11th. Saved by Fire

The startling story of a clean-cut young man who struggles to operate a heavily encumbered piece of oil land which catches on fire. The fire scenes and thrilling rescues, which really transpired, form one of the season's best pictures. About 1,000 feet.

Nov. 12th. Between Love and the Law

A rattling good western romance, which tells the story of a rugged game warden and his efforts to preserve law and order in an unlawful community. Excellent western feature. About 1,000 feet.

Nov. 13th. The Lost Inheritance

A remarkable story of how a bogus duke stood between father and son. One of the scenes in the picture depicts athletic night at one of the big social clubs. The boxing and wrestling contests are worth double the price of admission that you will charge. About 1,000 feet.

Nov. 14th. Old Songs and Memories

A vivid vitalization of pleasant reminiscences of an aged couple who see again the vanished scenes of their youth, as the young people sing the old familiar songs. A picturesque feature. About 1,000 feet.

Nov. 15th. Shanghaied

A strong virile story of adventure and heroism at sea. A tale of love and adventure, romance and daring. See how a big yacht was saved from being burned by the quick work of a young sailor. About 1,000 feet.

SELIG 2 REELS

A Wild Animal Sensation, presenting a thrilling story of life in the Transvaal Jungles. This is one of the greatest animal pictures ever produced, and there are enough exciting moments, hairbreadth escapes and daring ventures to interest the most blase. This is a picture that is sure to attract and hold the interest of your patrons and to remain fresh for a long time in their memory.

THE MILLS OF THE GODS

VITAGRAPH 3 REELS

Signore Lorenzo, a wealthy and ambitious plebeian, seeks to dethrone Prince Gian of Milan. Lorenzo becomes enamored of Maria, a beautiful peasant girl, who repulses his attentions and is protected by Miguel, whom she soon marries. Through Lorenzo's influence they are driven from home into direst poverty, and Maria's death soon follows. Miguel later acquires wealth, but again falls victim to Lorenzo's treachery, who bribes his servant, Tano, to incinerate Miguel's property. Lorenzo's attempts to steal Miguel's beautiful daughter and usurp the throne are foiled, and he is betrayed by Tano into a vacant house; the place is fired, and his life ground out by the Mills of the Gods, that are inexorable in their ultimate gristing of souls.

FRENZIED FINANCE

PATHE 3 REELS

Claude Rogers, a reckless gambler, falls heir to a banking business through the will of his father-in-law. The bank, when he receives it, is staple and secure, but Rodgers immediately launches a "Get-rich-quick" scheme and starts a campaign to get depositors by promises of fabulous interest. The bank soon becomes the largest, although not the safest, in the East. But good things cannot last forever, and with his wife's sickness Rodgers' luck turns. A run on the bank is the next misfortune, and because of Rodgers' extravagance it cannot stand the strain. Amidst a scene of wild disorder at the Stock Exchange, the bank's stock collapses. A mob of ruined depositors storms the home of the banker, pursuing him through the rooms until they find that a bullet from his revolver has brought his reckless career to a close.

The Lion Tamer's Revenge

Cines-Kleine Release October 21, 1912. Two Reels

A sensational story in which lions play an important part and cause many a thrill. Love, jealousy and revenge are, of course, the principal ingredients in this splendid drama, the closing scene being wonderful. A jealous lover, with the assistance of a clown—the play being enacted in a circus—lures his rival and his partner, the girl, into the den of lions, and binds them to a post. The woman manages to escape, later to accuse the murderer, but the lover is mangled to death by the infuriated lions.

The Count of Monte Cristo

Selig Release October 14, 1912. Three Reels

The wonderful and tragic story of Edmond Dantes, a young Frenchman, who is entrusted with a message to the exiled Napoleon on the Isle of Elba, forms one of the greatest themes ever written upon. The full reproduction of this masterpiece by Selig is unequalled by any stage production. There are over 300 people in the cast and shows the wonderful scene, gorgeous costumes and elaborate stage setting. This is one of the most fascinating pictures ever produced.

Shakespeare's As You Like It

Vitagraph Release October 7, 1912. Three Reels.

Presented by the Vitagraph Company, with ROSE COGHLAN as Rosalind.

The Man Hunt

Pathe Release September 30, 1912. Two Reels.

Kilborne, a poacher, is loved by Rose, the daughter of an old charwoman, whose cabin in the midst of a dense forest is Kilborne's rendezvous. Although Rose has often saved Kilborne from the hand of the law, brutal treatment is her only reward, for Kilborne is in love with a farmer's daughter. He is being tracked by the gendarmes, and Rose, suspecting that he is at the farmer's house, hurries there to warn him of the impending danger. The police arrive at the farm immediately after her and surround the house. When Kilborne steps through the door he is ordered to surrender. He refuses. An officer raises his gun and fires. Rose steps in front of Kilborne as the shot rings out and receives the bullet in her heart. As she breathes her last Kilborne weeps for the first time in his life and realizes the depth of the love he never recognized.

Daughter of the Spy

Cines-Kleine Release September 16, 1912. Two Reels

This is a story of a spy who gives shelter in his own home to a nobleman fleeing from the soldiers. The nobleman informs his host and his beautiful daughter of his identity and shortly after a file of soldiers enters the house and places him under arrest. Before going to prison, he denounces father and daughter for their duplicity. Heart-broken, at the fate of the nobleman, the daughter determines to make a desperate effort to release him. On a pretext she enters the prison and is shown about, noting carefully the location of the prisoner's cell. By a ruse, she procures the keys to the cell directly above that of the nobleman and with a crow-bar breaks a hole in the flooring, lowers a rope and helps the prisoner to liberty. The two make a perilous descent down the castle wall to the casement below. Meanwhile, the girl's father, the spy, is on the wall with the sentry, and discerning the figures of the fugitives, seizes a rifle and fires. To his horror he finds he has taken the life of his own daughter.

The Blighted Son

Pathe Release September 9, 1912. Four Reels.

This is a story of a young man whose father is very wealthy. He leads a life of reckless dissipation until the father, learning the use his son is making of the money, refuses to furnish further funds. The young fellow thereupon commits his first crime; the crime of theft. The shock of this disgrace brings an attack of apoplexy upon the father, which makes him totally blind. From this time it is a rapid drop to bankruptcy for the once honored family. When it is too late the young man realizes his error and determines to begin life anew. He leaves his native country for South Africa and, after fearful hardships, which develop the better side of his character, he returns to his native land—a man.

Fire at Sea

Pathe Release August 26, 1912. Two Reels.

An old sea captain, a slave to liquor, is hired to sail the schooner "Joanna" with a cargo of gunpowder for a revolutionary project. A young man sails with him, against the advice of his sweetheart, who has a premonition of evil. When a few days out to sea, and while the young sailor is asleep, the skipper drinks until he is irresponsible. He goes into the powder room smoking his pipe. Soon he falls asleep and the pipe, dropping from his hand, ignites the powder. A deafening roar and the vessel is a mass of flames, leaving a wreck-strewn sea and a red glow in the sky to tell a waiting sweetheart the story of her lover's fate.

Rip Van Winkle

Vitagraph Release August 19, 1912. Two Reels.

This legend is written by Washington Irving, of the time of George III of England, during the occupation of this country by the English in the 18th century. The story of Rip Van Winkle, the happy-go-lucky, ne'er-do-well, is well known to every child. Rip Van Winkle is portrayed by that eminent actor, Mr. Robert McWade, Sr., who was associated for so long with the famous Joe Jefferson. The splendid Vitagraph Company carry out the other parts in their usual creditable way.

Rameses, King of Egypt

Cines-Kleine Release August 12, 1912. Two Reels.

A production of unparalleled magnificence, depicting a thrilling romance, laid in the days of ancient Egypt.

King Rameses, hearing of the beauty of a young shepherdess, disguises himself as a peasant and journeys to her home. She resents his ardent advances and tells him of her devoted lover, a shepherd, tending his flocks on the mountain slopes.

The King, angered, has her carried off by force to his palace. Although rejected, he determines to win her with lavishness, but without avail.

The shepherd, hearing of his lover's abduction, vows vengeance on King Rameses and attempts to stab him.

When again the king's advances to the shepherdess are rejected, he orders the two lovers before him and, in all the magnificence of the Egyptian court, he magnanimously commands their marriage to take place.

The splendor of the Oriental Courts, wonderful processions and ceremonies are all shown in a story not soon forgotten.

PHILADELPHIA PRESS, OCTOBER 10th

PAGEANT IS VIEWED BY TWO GOVERNORS

Tener, of Pennsylvania, and Goldsborough, of Maryland, Are Guests.

CHEERS FOR GOVERNORS

When the two Governors and their parties arrived a cheer rose from the throats of the assembled thousands, and as the pageant had already started the party quickly took their seats and began to watch the spectacle.

Prior to leaving Governor Tener expressed his unqualified indorsement of the affair. "I think Philadelphia has done something to be proud of," he said. "The whole thing is marvelous. I have never seen anything like it in my life.

"Such historical displays should be encouraged and the people should also be encouraged to participate in them. Historical displays make for a patriotic citizenship as much as anything else I know of.

"I was particularly delighted with the scene depicting the reception of Benjamin Franklin at the Court of France. It was wonderfully graceful and the minuet delighted me also. But the thing that pleased me most was the dance of the shepherdesses, given in the scene showing the reception of General Washington at Gray's Garden.

"The whole pageant is an ideal way to present history. These scenes, apart from their great educational worth, are so artistically designed and so faithful in the smallest detail to the narrative of history that the spectacle is nothing short of marvelous."

PRAISES THE PAGEANT

Governor Goldsborough, of Maryland, was equally delighted. He said: "I think this is the most wonderful spectacle ever performed in this country, and I doubt if any equal to it can be found abroad. Beside the spectacular and attractive aspect of the pageant, it has the advantage of teaching a wonderful educational and historical lesson."

When the entire body of 4,300 performers had assembled on the field for the final march past the stands, and Mrs. Rudolph Blankenburg had appeared as Lady Philadelphia in the stirring epilogue which brings the pageant to an end, Mayor Blankenburg appeared and made a short address.

"I want to thank you," he said, addressing the assembled actors, "for the spirit you have shown in presenting the episodes of the pageant. I have never seen anything like it in my life, and I do not think anything like it can be produced in any other city of the country. I thank you again for your efforts.

"And now I have a request to make of you. One good turn deserves another. If you want a fitting climax for the work you have done, give us three other performances, with prices low enough that all can come. One performance tonight, and one on Monday and Tuesday afternoons. Give the school children a chance to see this wonderful spectacle from the seats in this grandstand for twenty-five cents. It is not much I am asking of you, and they will be greatly benefited by the history of our great country brought home forcibly."

SUCCESS OF THE PAGEANT

Never in the history of this country has there been a pageant projected on so large and comprehensive a scale, continued for so long or carried out with such success as in the case of the Historical Pageant given in West Fairmount Park last week. There were those who doubted that such a stupendous enterprise, calling for much money and the voluntary services of five thousand men, women and children, could be brought to successful fruition. There were those who doubted that a popular or financial success could warrant such an undertaking.

All doubts were resolved by the fact. Not only did the pageant exceed all expectations in its historical scope and educational aspects, in the brilliancy of costumes, splendor of exhibition and smoothness of administration, but it achieved a financial success, more than repaying all the enormous outlay. This was in large part due to the weather, which was not only perfect, but the best that records show for the period since first they were kept by the Government. More than this, predictions are for equally good weather today and tomorrow, when the final extra performances will be given for the benefit of the friends of the players and that portion of the public which could not afford the prices which ruled last week.

Not only was the pageant picturesque and theatrical to an unexpected degree, but it was and must remain an object lesson in patriotism whose value cannot be estimated. It is no overstatement to say that most of the onlookers got a finer perspective of our history, a better understanding of the "episodes" portrayed than would be possible by any amount of reading. To children this was an especially fine educational exhibit. Much of the credit is, of course, due to Dr. Oberholtzer, who directed and largely conceived the entire pageant, and to Mr. Francis Howard Williams, who wrote the "book" of the exhibition. It is true that the enormous space covered made it necessary to omit much of the dialogue, and much that was given was not heard; but this was of less importance, since visitors had the book in their hands and could follow closely the meaning of every display and the symbolism, which was, in the last analysis, one of the finest parts of the show. But to the thousands of volunteers must also go great credit.

It only remains to say that this must become a permanent institution. Its value is inestimable and in Philadelphia alone can such a thing happen. The Historical Pageant has come to stay and all of the United States must come to witness it.

STATE RIGHTS BUYERS

BECAUSE we have the best feature insight of any concern in this country—because we know the difference between a real feature and several thousand feet of film, and knowing these things we play absolutely fair with the buyer. Every subject is sold on its merits. Some are better than others and we say so, both in justice to the buyer's present right and with an eye to our own future. We consider standard to be imperative—SUCCESS MUST BE EARNED. We believe advertising to represent our business word and trustworthiness. We know facts are indisputable, so we heed them. It is the profit a buyer makes on his present purchase that enables him to order our next release. By building on solid ground we have no cave-ins. Our policy is strictly business. We are the modern feature business concern—you know it.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

CINES.

ON THE FIRING LINE (Nov. 12).—With drums beating and colors flying the gay Italian regiment marches down to the wharves to be transported to Tripoli, Colonel Sandor is in command and he directs affairs with rare judgment and ability. He is closely attended by Tony, his faithful servant who has been instructed by Claretta, the Colonel's little daughter, to "take good care of father."

Under escort of the fleet, the expedition arrives at the seat of war, and great excitement prevails during the disembarkment of the troops, the erection of tents, and the general preparation for active campaigning.

The film subsequently shows several scenes of the conflict; the skirmish; the swift charge of the Italian lancers; the troops behind their entrenchments pouring shot and shell into the ranks of the enemy; the arrival of reinforcements which inspire new courage into the hearts of the men; the forward movement of the infantry; the remarkable charge through the valley with many fierce encounters; and the final victory by the dislodgement of the Turkish forces from their position on the hill.

After the battle, Colonel Sandor is highly congratulated, and in turn rewards Tony with a medal of honor, for he realizes that the fellow showed remarkable bravery, and even saved his life in one instance.

When they return home, the Colonel and Tony receive a warm welcome from little Claretta, who is very proud of them both.

THE OLD ACTOR'S VISION (Nov. 16).—Ragged and forlorn, old Anthony trudges wearily on his way along the dusty road until his strength fails and he falls down in a heap, utterly exhausted.

Soon a motor car halts by the hapless figure and kind hands assist him into the car, in which he is carried to the nearest poorhouse, where he is fed and made comfortable. After his bodily wants have been satisfied, he slowly forgets the present and sinks into a deep reverie; vision after vision of his former splendor and affluence appear before his eyes.

Scenes of days when he was making a great reputation for himself upon the stage; of the happy hours of his youth and of the great feasts at which his name was toasted with rich wines, follow one another in delightful succession.

He smiles in contemplation, but suddenly in the midst of his reverie he awakes and is again brought into the realization of his present misery. His very soul is galled by the degradation of it all. In desperation he places his pack upon his back and leaves the despised refuge of the poor to wander off into the great unknown.

LIFE AND INDUSTRIES IN ADEN CAMPO (Nov. 16).—A fascinating travelogue, spreading before us many places of interest in and about the town of Aden Campo. We are shown the Square, the Marabout Shrine, the monument to Queen Victoria, many queer types of Arabs, Indians and Negroes, and several delightful views of the town and the picturesque bay.

ECLIPSE.

REVIEWING FRENCH TROOPS BY AIRSHIP (Nov. 13).—"All aboard!" The ropes are released, and the great dirigible arises skyward. With her propellers revolving rapidly the huge craft soars over the beautiful parade ground where the army is maneuvering. After witnessing many interesting military scenes, we are taken over the city of Paris, which is spread before us in a series of panoramic views in which a splendid idea of the city is obtained for the photography in the film is marvelously clear.

SPECIMENS OF LIZARDS AND FROGS (Nov 13).—An interesting as well as instructive nature study, showing wall lizards, young alligators, queer creatures called geckos and monitors, and many specimens of frogs.

THE TOWN OF COGNAC, FRANCE, AND ITS BRANDY INDUSTRY (Nov. 13).—After viewing many picturesque scenes of this town on the River Charente, we are taken through a large brandy distillery, in which every step in the process of manufacturing the famous cognac is clearly shown.

VITAGRAPH.

CAPTAIN BARNACLE, REFORMER (Nov. 11).—Ebenezer White is a hard-fisted money-lender. His son Ned is a scapegrace and is turned outdoors by his father. Ned tries to reform, however, and asks for another chance. White refuses to give him one. Barnacle drops in in the midst of this family row, to pay his rent, to White, who is his landlord. Ned in despair drowns his sorrows in drink and is thrown out of the village saloon. He is found by Barnacle, who takes him to his home, sobers him up and with the help of Ruth, makes him feel the comforts of home life. Then with the assistance of Bunce, he gets him a berth aboard ship, and lends him money enough to start life anew.

Time passes, Ned makes good and writes his mother that he is coming home from his first voyage and will meet her at Barnacle's, as he does not want to return home till his father asks him. The night Ned reaches home, there is a storm off the coast and a ship is wrecked. Ned nearly loses his life in rescuing the passengers. As he is lying at the point of death, as is supposed, news is carried to White, and suddenly a sense of the wrong and heartlessness he has shown his son is brought home to him by Captain Barnacle. He goes to Ned's bedside and begs his forgiveness and he and his family are reunited.

THE PROFESSOR AND THE LADY (Nov. 12).—Miss Fullom's Young Ladies' Seminary has but one male inhabitant, Professor Bunkem, who feels very much agitated over his lonely condition. Tramps break into the school kitchen and the professor is called upon to dislodge them. He makes a show at bravado, but they do not go until they get good and ready. Outside the Professor tells them he will pay them handsomely if they will break into the house at night and give him an opportunity of intimidating them, impressing Miss Fullom, and winning her heart by his bravery. They agree. He catches them in the act of burglarizing the school, and with the assistance of the cook and the girls, he has them securely in his power, much to the admiration of the principal.

Later he gets the cook to spill grease into the stove and fill the house with smoke, shout fire and create a panic. She does as she is told. Miss Fullom rushes into the kitchen, and all the girls flee from the building. The professor grabs Miss Fullom in his arms and rescues her from what seems to be certain death by suffocation. That's the finish! The preceptress is ready to admit that a man is a very handy thing to have around the house, and could make no better choice for a husband than Professor Bunkum.

AQUATIC ELEPHANTS (Nov. 12).—This way for the elephants! Regular diving Venuses, mermaids of the deep. Watch them "Loop the Loop," bathe in sportive play and take part in the diving stunts of the most daring water-nymphs who have ever dipped in Neptune's realms.

LORD BROWNING AND CINDERELLA (Nov. 13).—Everything is in anticipation at the home of the widow Gibson. Her two daughters are anxious to make an impression with Lord Browning. Her step-daughter, Cinderella, is carefully kept in the background. While they are waiting, a storm arises and Lord Browning is overtaken by it. He seeks shelter in a fisherman's hut and learns of the Gibson family from the old fisherman. Mrs. Gibson and her two daughters and step-daughter, are caught in the same storm and they also take refuge in the fisherman's hut. Lord Browning, seeing them approaching, disguises himself in fisherman's clothes. The mother and her daughters enter very haughtily, and not recognizing him, are very patronizing and seem to be contaminated by having to accept the hospitality of the hut. Not so with Cinderella. She is a friend of the old fisherman, treats him very kindly and enters into conversation with Lord Browning. The next day, Browning, dressed as the fisherman, comes to Mrs. Gibson's to sell fish. He is harshly dismissed and told to go to the basement door. He speaks to Cinderella, and she kindly directs him and is very friendly with him.

Lord Browning has made up his mind to reveal himself. He returns to the fisherman's home, changes his clothingfi and in his machine, visits the Gibsons. They receive him very graciously and when he asks for Cinderella, they reluctantly call her and superciliously introduce her. Lord Browning calls frequently after that and he soon announces his engagement to Cinderella. Her stepmother and sisters are so chagrined it is an ordeal for them to congratulate her. Their first thought and pleasure after announcing their engagement is to hurry to their old friend, the fisherman, to tell him the good news, which he joyfully receives and approves with his blessing.

BILLY'S PIPE DREAM (Nov. 14).—William Winfield, familiarly known in Wall Street as Billy, comes into a considerable fortune. Soon after, he receives a letter from an old college chum, Bob Baxter, telling him he has gone into the theatrical business and has a fine comic opera company which only needs a little backing. Billy consents to finance the scheme.

He is still more delighted on meeting Ruby and Pert, two of the company, who call him "Angel" Billy. He becomes enamoured of Ruby and showers her with flowers and presents. The company leave for the South. Billy is to follow them shortly. He receives the most flattering press notices from Baxter, who also calls for more money. After reading the press notices, he is satisfied, and the missives continue to come in. One day, after receiving a batch, he falls asleep and dreams that he is a theatrical millionaire, the owner of winning racehorses, a house on Riverside Drive, where he entertains lavishly, and the husband of Ruby. He wakes up as his servant enters, to receive a telegram that the company is "Bust," and stranded, he must foot the bills and bring them home. He sits staring at the message, a sadder and a wiser man.

UNA OF THE SIERRAS (Nov. 14).—Brought up as a child of the Sierras, with her father, a lone hermit, Una is as sweet and natural as a wild flower. His health is broken and he feels that his days are numbered. He writes his sister, Mrs. James Court, residing in the city, that he feels the end is near and he must leave Una in her care. She will be no burden to her as she has ample means to care for herself.

Mrs. Court arrives in the Sierras too late to meet her brother alive. She takes Una to her home. Una's wealth makes her a desirable catch and one Sharpe, a stock broker, tries to captivate her, but instinctively, she recoils from him and does not hesitate to let him know that she has no use for him.

She prefers Clifford, who often calls at the Court mansion, and tells him so and doesn't care who knows it. Clifford is also a stock broker and when Sharpe finds out that Una favors his business associate, he determines to ruin Clifford, who is anxious to secure the directorship of the B. C. & L. R. R. Sharpe opposes him and induces all the stockholders to vote against him. Una hears of this and tells her uncle to buy up the B. C. & L. R. R. stock. The young lady has passed her maturity and he obeys. Una hurriedly reaches the meeting of the Board of Directors, throws the stock upon the table with her votes, and places the gavel in the hand of the astonished Clifford. Sharpe is discomfited. Clifford hurries to the home of his mother and tells how Una has saved him from defeat. Una kisses his mother and then turns to Clifford and throwing her arms around his neck, asks him if they are engaged. He replies by clasping her tightly to his breast and planting a kiss upon her forehead.

AN UNEXPECTED HONEYMOON (Nov. 18).—Newly married Thomas and Mary MacGregor attend the village fair on their honeymoon. The balloon ascension is advertised for the afternoon. Everything is in readiness and Mary induces Thomas to enter the basket of the balloon. Some mischievous boys cut the ropes holding the balloon and it rises, taking the pair on a honeymoon trip entirely unexpected. They travel fast and long until the balloon collapses upon a desert island, among a tribe of cannibals, who think the couple are gods descended from the skies. Thomas deposes the king and runs things with a high hand. The natives, however, as they become better acquainted with Thomas and Mary, realize that they are only human beings like themselves. They decide to put an end to their reign and begin preparations for their execution and cooking. The night before the day they are to be put to death, Thomas and Mary escape to the seashore, where they hail a passing vessel, which lands a boat loaded with men, who rescue the terrified couple.

EDISON.

THE NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICER (Nov. 11).—"You've killed him, I tell you. For your own sake get out of the country immediately," urged Vincent Black, but Oakley was reluctant. Had he not caught the man red-handed, cheating? Of course, he hadn't meant to kill him when he knocked him down the stairs; but Black would listen to no refusal and Oakley finally left for France, where, sometime

Run twelve hours per day for one year without one repair

Falls Cities Amusement Company
NOVELTY THEATRE

Louisville, Ky., Oct. 9th, 1912.

The Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co.
Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sirs: One year ago today, I made a statement that I could run the MOTIOGRAPH machine in the Novelty Theatre a year, without any repairs, which I think is a good record.

This I did, and they were run on an average of 12 hours every day in the year. Yours very truly,

ERNEST CARPENTER.

Don't strain your imagination and buy a machine only on the advertising value.

Value that can't be shown and proven, value which is imagined, is a delusion.

You need not stretch your imagination to realize that solid steel "gig made" gears will outwear a cheap "type" metal gear with a highly polished nickel-plated face.

later, he joined the French army, saved his colonel's life, received recognition for valor before the regiment and was made a sergeant. The colonel soon discovered that Oakley was a man of breeding and made him his secretary, whereupon Oakley proceeded to fall in love with his daughter, Louise. But being only a non-commissioned officer, and compelled to keep his antecedents a secret, he saw no possibility of her father's sanctioning the suit. Fate proves the expediency however, and Oakley is discovered by a Lieutenant de Berg (also a suitor for the hand of Louise), making love to her. In the interview which follows de Berg consents to keep silent only on condition that rank be waived and that they fight a duel—the survivor to continue his suit unmolested. The meeting is arranged and de Berg is wounded. Two soldiers accidentally see the encounter and inform the colonel. Later Oakley is court-martialed but refuses to divulge the cause of the duel. Oakley's friend, Black, endeavors to secure his release, but without avail. Eventually he meets an English lawyer who informs him that he is searching for one Jonas Oakley, who is now heir to a large estate. Black tells him everything, and by their united efforts they secure Oakley's release through a written confession from de Berg. Affairs of the heart and honor are readjusted, and Louise's happiness is entrusted to the now "Lord Oakley."

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, AND ITS SURROUNDINGS (Nov. 12).—This city by the inland salt sea makes a novel subject for the motion picture devotee who wishes to combine knowledge with pleasure. Salt Lake City is beautifully located at the base of the high mountains that almost encircle it and one is given a complete and thorough view of the surrounding country from Immigration to Cottonwood Canyon, from the bathers in the Salt Lake to that masterpiece of Western architecture, the Mormon Temple, which lies in the very heart of the city.

LINKED TOGETHER (Nov. 12).—A very youthful pair of lovers, Dick and Nellie, have their first quarrel, and as usual, about nothing. They agree to disagree and positively refuse to speak to each other. A little later her young sister, Madge, celebrates her ninth birthday by entertaining a number of children on the lawn in front of the house. Nellie is doing her best to make the little ones happy. Her father, a police captain, takes advantage of this opportunity to bring about a reconciliation between the lovers but to no avail. Little Madge then plans to reconcile them by cleverly handcuffing them during an unguarded moment. This brings about a number of droll situations which the children of the party seem to enjoy hugely. Nellie quickly decides to put an end to her embarrassing position by going direct to the police station, dragging Dick after her, with the giggling children following behind. At the station house her father, the police captain, refuses to unlock the handcuffs until they promise to make up their little differences and become good friends again. They now see their folly and make up. Father unlocks the handcuffs and sends them home in a happy mood, bringing about a reconciliation of the young lovers in a most unexpected manner.

A THRILLING RESCUE BY "UNCLE MUN" (Nov. 12).—The story opens with Mr. Nankivel's studio in the country. We find him busy drawing a series of sketches. These become animated and go through a performance which mystifies one and provokes irresistible laughter at the same time. While thus engaged he receives a note from the Golf Club urging him to disguise as Uncle Mun and play a game of golf with a would-be-champion.

He soon arrives at the Club House as Uncle Mun, accompanied by Dot, his mascot, and after the usual preliminaries the game begins. Those who play golf, as well as those who do not, will become interested and laugh to their heart's content at Uncle Mun's impossible shots. While the game is at its height the caddie discovers a house on fire in the village. Uncle Mun, an enthusiastic member of the Volunteer Fire Department, stops the play abruptly and answers the call of duty. To give the alarm he drives one golf ball after another in rapid succession toward the bell tower, a mile away, striking the bell with the accuracy of a rifle shot. The ringing bell quickly brings out the volunteers. Uncle Mun joins them and they rush to the burning building. There, to their horror, a small child is seen struggling amid flame and smoke in an upper window. For a moment rescue seems impossible, but Uncle Mun, always equal to any occasion, bounds from a bed spring to the upper story and clasping the child in his arms, he leaps from the burning window to the ground, right side up, with the agility of a cat, and smilingly turns the rescued tot over to its panic-stricken mother. In spite of the intense excitement Uncle Mun is applauded for his most wonderful and heroic act. The fire is soon subdued and as usual, the hose bursts and the crowd is drenched.

THE OLD REPORTER (Nov. 15).—The new proprietor of the "Star," discharges two old reporters. Joe Norris, who has worked for the paper thirty years, is one of them. After a week's search Joe lands a place on another paper, but only as a space writer, and with very uncertain pay. He is indifferently told to go and bring in what news he can of the theft of a famous painting from the art gallery. Arriving there he meets several detectives and newspaper men whom he knows, all bent upon the same mission as himself.

Kean, a detective with whom he has exchanged courtesies for years, tells him there is absolutely no clew. As he makes a few notes, his pencil breaks, and he borrows a knife of an attendant of the gallery who is passing. A bit of gilt on the blade of the knife attracts his attention. The frame from which the painting was cut is a gold one; the attendant knew its enormous value. He borrows a small magnifying glass from his friend, the detective, and makes comparisons. The clew is a strong one and he gets his friend's promise to give him two hours' grace to scoop the story, should he land the thief.

They watch the suspected man and trail him to a saloon, where he meets two art dealers. The detective interests the bartender, while Joe watches the trio over the partition of the back room. The painting is brought from underneath the attendant's vest, where it had been wrapped around his body. There is a sensational arrest of the three and Joe rushes off, writing his story.

A habit of thirty years is not easily broken, and in his enthusiasm over getting the story, Joe unconsciously goes to the "Star" office and to his old desk. When the city editor sees him, and looks over his shoulder at the scoop, he promises Joe to see that the boss takes him back, for he has done what none of the new regime could accomplish.

SELIG.

THE DYNAMITERS (Nov. 5).—A story of love and jealousy among the members of a survey party over a pretty mountain girl, forms the foundation of "The Dynamiters." The blowing up of a dynamite shack starts the excitement. The man that is responsible for the explosion manages for a time to place the blame on the shoulders of his rival, while he goes off and celebrates over the success of his plan. The rival, meantime, experiences great difficulty in keeping out of the clutches of the quickly-formed posse. He is aided on his way by his sweetheart, who manages to keep the posse engaged until her lover has a good start on them. After his exciting get-away, he manages to trace the job back to his former partner, and, after clearing himself in the eyes of his friends, he returns to find his sweetheart still holding the fort. She mistakes him for one of his late enemies, and gives him a hot reception. She, however, discovers her mistake in time and he is amply repaid for his close call.

SAVED BY FIRE (Nov. 11).—A startling story of a clean strong young man who struggles to herd and operate a heavily encumbered piece of oil land, in spite of the "pressure" brought to bear by a great corporation, and the manipulations of an unscrupulous "loan shark" who is in love with the oil man's fiance. Curiously enough through the miscarriage of his enemies' tricked scheme, the good young man is saved through the burning of his oil tanks, by which they hoped to ruin him.

BETWEEN LOVE AND LAW (Nov. 12).—Fred Duval, a game warden sincerely loves Ruth Miller who lives in a ranch near his reserve. While these men presumably live through the sale of cattle, they really gain a livelihood by poaching on old national reserve shooting deer and elk out of season. The girl hears of these misdeeds and unconsciously gives the clue to her lover, who cleverly solves the secret. He saves them from the penalties of the law, by assuming the obligation himself.

OLD SONGS AND MEMORIES (Nov. 14).—This film is a vivid vitalization of pleasant reminiscenes of an aged couple who see again the scenes of their youth, as a party of visiting young folks sing the songs of long ago.

SHANGHAIED (Nov. 15).—Bob Bartlett, a wealthy young yachtsman falls into evil ways and his sweetheart Bessie Barset, the belle of the village, repudiates him as utterly unworthy, which gives comfort to his rival Cal Cooper, a stalwart young sailorman. The health of the young woman is shattered by her experiences and her father takes her to sea with him. Bob discovered in the gutter singularly enough is shanghaied and taken on this ship. How he redeems himself, wins the respect of the girl and saves the ship from fire at sea, furnishes an interesting story of the deep.

LUBIN.

THE WAY OF THE MOUNTAINS (Nov. 11).—Don Allen and Bob Taylor, two young mountaineers, love Mary Beall, a lass of the hills. Tommy, Mary's little brother, favors Bob, much to the chagrin of Don. Later Mary goes down to a water hole to get a bucket of water when Don spies her and determines to declare his love. He follows her and in his rough way endeavors to force his love upon her. She repels him. Bob, who has been hunting in the hills, hears her screams and rushes to her assistance, besting Don. The favored one then escorts her home. Don waits his opportunity to get even and when Bob leaves the house he shoots at his enemy, misses him and kills Tommy, the girl's little brother. Bob turns the body over to a relative of the family and follows Don. Coming up to him on horse-back, they have a gruelling fight. Don, overcoming Bob, throws him over his head to the ground, leaving him for dead, and rides back to the Beall home telling them that Bob did the shooting. Mary, who is determined to avenge her brother's death, comes upon Bob and assists him to reach home in time to give the lie to Don's testimony. Don is taken out by the rough mountaineers and one can easily guess his finish.

AT THE RAINBOW'S END (Nov. 12).—John Lee, son of a country grocer, hates his sordid life. His life contains one golden day of romance—a day of Arcadian love spent with Elane, a futile rebel against her fate, for she is married to a man she loathes, to whom she has been literally sold by her cold and grasping mother. John marries a girl of his own station, pretty at first, but soon growing into a nagging woman. He is poor with nothing of beauty in life but his dreams of Elane. Elane also dreams of her one day of romance, and when free—a widow—she searches for and finds John Lee. Still a rebel against fate, Elane determines to possess the lover of her dreams. He responds to the lure of her love, and neither realizing that their passion is but the impersonal yearning of their dreams, they prepare to flee together. At the last instant they are awakened to the obligations of realities, and realize the implacability of destiny, an incident, pathetic in its quintessence of the commonplace, shows them that they have been chasing a rainbow, at the end of which is no casket of gold.

THE COUNTRY SCHOOL-TEACHER (Nov. 14).—In a Western village lives Molly Mason, a girl who has never known restraint, and above all has never known kindness and love. Her brother, Fred, is fond of her in his rough way and admires her spirit of rebellion. Among the villagers she is a terror, and with the school pupils she is idolized as the captain of disorder. Budding into womanhood in her wild ways, Molly comes up against Neil Freeman, the new school-teacher. In the first day of school disorder Freeman takes in the situation. He realizes that discipline is the chief need of his over-grown pupils and he also realizes that Molly must be conquered of her rebellious ways. Neil Freeman is a man of determination and when he made up his mind to introduce that element of discipline in his school he meant to accomplish this at all hazard. Being a man of large frame and strength, he readily subdues the boys by physical force. With Molly it is a different proposition. His knowledge of women is that they must be handled with gentle firmness. These tactics Freeman uses with Molly, but as she does not understand them, she laughs. Her brother supports her in her rebellious attitude towards the teacher. Not until fright and pity are for the first time aroused in the heart of the girl is her rebellious spirit broken. This happens when her brother strikes Neil Freeman senseless in a fit of anger. Then Molly becomes a woman, and so much a woman that she falls in love with the very man she had declared she hated. Neil Freeman has long before fallen in love with the spirited girl.

THE SLATE INDUSTRY (Nov. 15).—The first picture is the quarry, the men are preparing the blast, which is presently fired and the huge slabs of slate are loosened and raised by derricks to the cutting yard. Here you see the process of splitting to conform to the thickness and size of the school slate. Next the polishing and framing. So far the work is done by men after which the slates are turned over to women for binding and lacing the edges.

SUITORS AND SUIT CASES (Nov. 15).—Sam and May love each other, but Dad wants May to marry Jones, who has more money. To get her away from Sam and with Jones, he arranges for an outing at the shore or the mountains. May sends word to Sam, who gets there before them. Meantime, through an accidental encounter at the station, Reggie a friend of Sam's makes an exchange of suit cases with May. He rips his trousers and sends them out to be mended. The messenger runs into a painter and gets the pants all daubed up. Reggie opens May's suit case and dons one of her dresses, he starts out in the hope of finding proper clothing. He runs into Sam who is waiting for May. Sam recognizes the dress. He explains the situation to Reggie who promises to keep up the masquerade and draw Dad and Jones off the scent. The scheme works until Jones tries to kiss the supposed May. Regie beats him up, but loses his hat and false hair. Jones blames Dad for all the row and gets him so angry that he is ready to accept Sam as a son-in-law.

CHIEF WHITE EAGLE (Nov. 16).—White Eagle, who is at school in the East, learns through a communication from the Government that his father has died, and that he is now Chief of the Tribe, receiving orders from the Government to proceed to a western post and there receive instructions from the Commanding Officer to assist in subduing the threatened uprising of his tribe. He arrives at the fort and meets with Estrella, a white woman who teaches him to love her, she affirming that she loves him. He asks her to marry him and she, never having thought of that side of it, turns on him and with names only befitting a dog. He in the heat of his injured pride and anger strangles her and returns to his tribe as their Chief. The Major commanding the fort finds the body of the woman and sends an order to Lieutenant Adair to find and shoot White Eagle on sight. Finding White Eagle in the camp dressed up in the garb of the Red Man who dared forget himself, Adair kills White Eagle though much against his will. After doing his duty he says a prayer to his God on behalf of the dead Chief and retires with his soldiers. The Indians return, kneel beside their dead chief, raise their hands to the Great Spirit, praying that his soul may go to the Happy Hunting Grounds.

DAYS OF '49 (Nov. 11).—Little Bear discovers a nugget of gold and returns to the camp of his tribe, where he is ordered by the chief to go on scout duty. Defying the authority of the chief Little Bear is punished with a poisoned arrow and banished from the tribe.

Wandering from the Indian camp, Little Bear comes across a party of settlers. He is aided by Eva and Ben, to whom he tells the location of the gold. The Indian dies and when the pioneers set forth to prospect, the young couple determine to investigate the Indian's story. Their plans are overheard by Spike, a hanger-on, who follows them.

Two Indian scouts capture Spike and as he is betraying the location of the camp, Ben and Eva discover his treachery and shoot the two braves. The shots are heard by the tribe of Indians who dash off to investigate.

Spike is killed by the Indians who now sight the camp and open fire. Finding it impossible to return, Ben and Eva succeed in locating the prospectors who run to the wagons and put the Indians to flight. When peace is restored Ben and Eva locate the mine which they call "The Little Bear" in honor of its discoverer.

THE YOUNG MILLIONAIRE (Nov. 13).—John Harris, a crippled young millionaire, breaks his engagement with Sarah Curtis when he discovers that she has been attracted by his wealth and covertly mocks him because of his affliction. Harris determines to put his club friends to the test and has an article published to the effect that he has lost his fortune. When the article appears Harris' former friends desert him. Disgusted with the shallowness of society Harris takes quarters in a tenement, hoping to discover true friendship among the poor.

In the meantime Anna Newton, a benevolent young woman of means, decides to write an article on tenement life and finds a room in the same building. The agent who conducts her to her quarters wishes to become better acquainted and forces his attentions on the young woman. Her cries attract Harris who hastens to the scene. But the crippled millionaire is no match for the rough agent, who throws the young man to the floor and stuns him.

Anna secures help and bears Harris to his room. She secretly engages a doctor, who finds some time later that Harris' accident permits his broken limb to be reset.

Harris leaves the tenement upon his recovery but he cannot forget his kind friend. He returns just as Anna has completed her story and is about to leave the tenement. Harris tells her that he has secured a position as secretary in a household which also needs a governess and he induces her to accompany him. Anna does so, feeling that she must now confess that she has deceived the poor (?) young man. When they arrive at the Harris mansion the butler addresses his master before the millionaire can warn him and his secret is discovered. Anna now has a confession to make and the adventure culminates in a visit to a nearby parsonage.

I SAW HIM FIRST (Nov. 15).—Jack Newell, to escape his feminine admirers, attempts to isolate himself for the summer in a small camp at Lakeside. He finds, however, that he has made a grievous mistake as he has located himself in an Adamaless Eden. The rivalry among the young ladies is very keen when young Newell makes his appearance. Their schemes are numerous and original and must be seen to be appreciated.

THE BACHELOR'S BRIDE (Nov. 15).—Nellie, the village flirt, endeavors to win Bachelor Brown but her efforts are not crowned with success. Brown gets a telegram reading, "Blanch is yours if you are here by ten o'clock Wednesday." He leaves the city in haste and drops the telegram, which comes into the hands of Nellie who informs her friends that Brown has gone to get married. Preparations are made to receive him in royal fashion and when he returns he is besieged with entreaties to introduce his wife. Brown is nonplussed and when the Blanch mentioned in the telegram is shown to be a handsome black puppy, the joke is on Nellie and her friends.

BATTLE IN THE VIRGINIA HILLS (Nov. 16).—Sam Tucker, leader of a band of hardy Virginia mountaineers, is waylaid and shot by Tom Hood, the leader of a rival clan. When Tucker arrives home badly wounded, his sister, Nancy, attires herself in his clothes and sets forth to avenge him. Knowing the Tuckers will seek vengeance, Tom Hood warns his young cousin, Joe, who takes the trail and fires at a suspicious figure which he sees lurking in the brush. His shot is well directed and when he approaches his victim he is horrified to discover that he has wounded a girl. Full of repentance he carries Nancy to his cabin and awaits developments.

Several days later the Tuckers become alarmed at Nancy's absence. The clan is gathered together and a search is instituted for the missing girl. Suddenly they come upon Joe, standing guard over his cabin. They fire at him and the shots are heard by the Hoods who hasten to the scene. Soon a fierce battle is waged and Joe and Nancy watch the conflict from the window of the cabin. The young people have fallen in love and determine to beseech their kinsmen to end the feud. When they appear from the cabin with a truce flag the rival leaders step up but refuse to listen to the entreaty. Renounced by their families, Joe and Nancy journey forth, hand in hand, and are married by a mountaineer justice.

ESSANAY.

FROM THE SUBMERGED (Nov. 12).—The man, a poor vagrant, is about to cast himself into the river when he is stopped and started upon the right road by the poor girl. He discovers his father is advertising to learn his whereabouts, returns home, is forgiven and finds a fortune at his command. Some time later he is engaged to the rich girl and a slumming party is made up one night. They visit Chinatown and pass the well-known bread line, at which the rich girl sneers and laughs. Realizing how little of real life she knows, the man, disgusted with the social whirl of her class, dons his old attire and wanders down by the river for a breath of fresh air. Here it is that the poor girl, more wretched and ragged than ever, comes to cast herself into the black waters. As she had saved him once, so now does he prevent her from carrying out her design, recognizes her and leads her tenderly to his beautiful home as his wife for all time.

THE HOUSE OF PRIDE (Nov. 13).—James Williams, a young city purchasing agent, receives a letter from Flannery, the city political boss, advising that the Acme Paving Material Company must get the city's winter contract. A large bribe is offered Williams to put this deal through. In a fury of resentment, Williams orders the bearer of the letter, Mullin, a corrupt politican, from the office. Mullin goes, but unknowingly leaves the letter in Williams' possession. A few days later Williams quarrels with his wife about her extravagance in dress, and she unthinkingly demands that he get money as other men do and support her properly. In a blind rage, Williams calls Flannery on the 'phone and agrees to accept his proposition. A week later Williams gives a reception at his home. During the course of the evening Frank Holt, president of the Acme Paving Material Company, attempts to embrace Mrs. Williams while under the influence of liquor. Williams comes upon the scene, furiously confronts Holt and his henchmen, including Flannery, Mullin, and Wharton, produces the incriminating bribe letter and threatens to send them all to prison. Next morning Mrs. Williams receives a letter from Mrs. Holt telling of her great suffering and to plead with Williams not to prosecute her husband. Thoroughly repentant, Mrs. Williams does so, Williams tears up the letter, and happiness reigns once more in the house of pride.

CUTTING CALIFORNIA REDWOODS (Nov. 14).—The spectator is transported by train to the wonderful Redwood district of California. Reaching the lumber camps an immense giant of the forest, fourteen feet in diameter at the base and towering three hundred and sixty feet tall, is shown about to be felled. With double-headed axes the men hack the base nearly through from one side, then the undercut is finished from the opposite side with a saw. For a moment the giant totters, then falls with a crash. Next the bark is peeled, the tree cut into logs and these logs are yarded out by means of a donkey-engine and conveyed on flat cars to the river where they are launched into the water and yarded down to the main landing. This, together with magnificent views of hundred of cleared acres of timber land, make as interesting a full-reel subject as has ever been released.

MR. UP'S TRIP TRIPPED UP (Nov. 15).—Mr. Up receives a letter from his Neighbor, Calvert, just across the hall, to join them at the summer resort for a week's outing. Up immediately 'phones a baggage man and leaves word to call for his trunk at seven next morning. Seven o'clock arrives and Up's alarm clock does a merry jig on the chair beside the bed, but Up sleeps peacefully on. Awakening at last he discovers he has but fifteen minutes to catch the train, piles all his clothes into the trunk and sends it off with the baggage man. Then he looks around for some clothes to wear and finds everything has gone in the trunk. Clad only in his pajamas he dashes madly down the street after the departing wagon, is arrested, hauled back to his apartment, and is released when he forks over a bribe. Determined to secure clothes he enters Calvert's apartment across the hall, holds up the new butler at gun's point, relieves him of his duds and forces him to don the pajamas. Endeavoring to make the train he is forced to forsake a slow cab, is knocked from a crowded street car, bowls over a colored washwoman and is again arrested. Meanwhile, the new butler is discovered by the maid and, not being able to explain his pajamas, is also arrested and hauled into the station. A moment later Mr. Up is likewise led in and complications set in thick and fast when Calvert arrives, having returned because of his sick child. Matters are finally disentangled to the satisfaction of all concerned.

ALKALI IKE'S CLOSE SHAVE (Nov. 16).—"Alkali" Ike, with a luxuriant growth of beard that he has carefully fostered, determines to see the city for the first time. He arrives, and not being a good dodger, is knocked insensible by the first automobile he encounters. His disfigured face is shaven by a doctor, who adorns it with several large strips of plaster, gives him some new clothes and turns him loose. Arriving back in his home town he meets his wife's sister, attempts to embrace her and she, not recognizing his shaven face, summons the aid of a group of punchers who immediately put Alkali through a course of rough treatment, including a ducking in the watering trough, and finally land him in the town jail. In desperation Alkali sends for his wife to identify him, but the loss of his whiskers puzzles her and she refuses to claim him. Alkali puts in a few more hours of torture and the sheriff is about to identify him as a notoriously escaped criminal, when the city doctor arrives and manages to extricate Alkali from his predicament. Thereupon, wifey claims him and takes him home for safe keeping.

MELIES.

THE GOVERNOR'S CLEMENCY (Nov. 21).—Jim lives in the Golden West. He owns a young apricot orchard and is engaged to marry Mary. His brother, Tom, is a blacksmith back East, but as business is bad, decides to join his brother. He sells out his shop and bids farewell to his wife, promising to be back soon with a fortune. While on his way out his brother's orchard is ruined by frost. Tom arrives unexpected, full of hope, only to find out Jim's misfortune. Both are disheartened, but Jim cheers him up optimistically, and says they will pull together and make their pile. Several weeks pass. Tom is unable to secure a position, and to cap the climax his wife writes that she is in need of money. In desperation, Tom decides to hold up the stagecoach. He takes a large handkerchief bearing Jim's name to use as a mask and stealthily leaves the house. Mary detects him and informs Jim.

Tom lays in ambush for the coach, but not knowing the roads well, has selected the wrong one. Nevertheless, he rushes out at the sound of approaching hoof-beats and is dumbfounded when he finds but a single rider. It is the governor. Tom orders his hands up at gun's point. We leave them thus and next see Jim riding desperately to prevent his brother from holding up the stage. He comes upon Tom riding easily home, who assures him that he did not rob the coach. But Jim's suspicions are aroused when he discovers Tom counting a roll of bills. He tells his sweetheart, and they decide to go to town to learn if there was a hold-up. From a distance they see Tom in the company of two sheriffs, and conclude that he has been arrested. Jim decides to shoulder his brother's guilt, and making a dash to the group, cries, "I am the guilty man; he is innocent." The sheriffs smile and Tom tells his brother the story of mistakingly holding up the governor, of how the benevolence of the old man aroused his conscience, of giving back the stolen articles and how the governor, upon learning his story, gave him money, and an official card to the sheriff, giving instructions to make Tom a game warden.

INDEPENDENT FILM STORIES

UNIVERSAL

ECLAIR.

THE BUSY BEE (Nov. 8).—This film shows men's ingenuity in furnishing and decoying the bee into a home of its own. The perfection of these hives is as essential as would be the building of a mansion. So it is necessary to prepare the waxen foundation for the bee's home, or comb in a laboratory. All of which is shown in its various evolutions.

Then is shown the bees at work in their hive. The artifice of bee swarming is carefully portrayed and then is shown the clever manipulations by which the honey is collected, still leaving the bee his house and structure, in which he will again faithfully perform the same labors in the season to come.

FUNNICUS' HUNTING EXPLOITS (Nov. 8).—Funnicus is hunting, while at his home many of his friends await his return very impatiently. Suddenly he makes his appearance, his game-bag full—of newspapers. He tells his friends that he actually disdains small game, and to illustrate the story of his wondrous adventures, turns the house topsy-turvy. His wife, alarmed, advises him to go to bed and calm his excited brain. Nightmares disturb his sleep. He finds himself in Africa, traveling on camel, accompanied by many guides. He arrives at an Arab's camp and jests with the Arabian maidens who, for revenge, put out his fires in the forest the following night. The fires out, the wild beasts arrive, and he just has time to climb a tree where he is out of reach of two big lions, who wait for him at the foot of the tree. Our great Hunter courageously risks his life by descending from the tree. He tries to strangle the lion, but suddenly awakens and finds himself clutching at his wife's throat.

GOLDEN HAIR (Nov. 10).—Ethel is a pretty milliner. Jack, who is employed in the neighborhood, is quite in love with pretty Ethel. The two young people become betrothed.

What gives a strange beauty to Ethel is her wonderful hair. One day, while delivering a hat to a wealthy customer, the lady asks her to try the hat on and marvels at Ethel's golden tresses. She offers to buy it, but, of course, Ethel refuses, even though offered quite a sum.

Jack receives a letter from his father that he is coming to see him, and that he brings good news. Jack is perplexed at the letter and tells Ethel that he will marry her if his father will allow or not.

The proposition the father had to make was to offer his son to the daughter of one of his neighbors, who had a big dowry. He even showed a photograph of the girl to Jack, but instead of answering his father, he went to fetch Ethel and then present her as being his betrothed.

The old peasant found the young girl allright, but his first question was, "How much dowry does she bring." The negative answer he received displeased him and he refused to allow his son to marry a girl who does not bring a marriage settlement.

When Ethel reached home, an idea crossed her mind. She might be able to get the dowry imposed by Jack's father. She knows the lady who offered to buy her hair and goes to her and tells her she consents to sell it. She has received the money and the hair-dresser is on the point of cutting the hair, when Jack comes in time to prevent her from making the sacrifice. He explains all to the lady who let Ethel have the money, and Jack and Ethel were married.

CONSTANTINOPLE (Nov. 10).—Showing many interesting and instructive bits of the life and industry of the Turkish capital.

CRYSTAL.

THE GYPSY FLIRT (Nov. 10).—Chester and Mabel are out walking. They meet Carlotta and Pedro, wandering gypsies. Carlotta tells Mabel's fortune and makes quite an impression on Chester, and he also has his fortune told. The next day they meet again and Mabel catches Chester in the act of kissing the pretty Gypsy girl. Insanely jealous, Mabel plans to teach Chester a lesson. She meets Pedso and pays him to make love to her in front of Chester. They come upon Chester hugging Carlotta, and Pedro, waxing wrath, chases Chester with a knife. Carlotta attacks Mabel and both the girls and the men engage the other in combat with the Gypsies victorious. Finally Pedro explains to Carlotta and all ends happily, when a moment before tumult reigned.

MAN WANTED (Nov. 10).—Miss Finch writes to a matrimonial agency for a husband. The agency sends Mr. I. S. Sharp with a letter of introduction. He loses the letter. Chester Barnett, fresh young drummer, finds the letter and visits the house. He meets Miss Finch's niece, Irene, and is very much taken up with her. She explains that the letter is for her aunt and inflicts Miss Finch on Chester. Miss Finch goes to get something for Chester to drink, but he escapes before her return, and goes out into the garden with Irene. Meanwhile the real Sharp arrives, and he and Chester have quite an altercation as to who is who. Just then a telegram arrives from the matrimonial agency explaining that Sharp is a bigamist, and to please hold him until the police arrive. Miss Finch sends for the constable, who arrives, and being unable to determine who is Sharp, takes both Chester and Sharp to the lock-up. Irene then finds Chester's valise, with his name on it, and thus effects his release. He makes love to Irene and Miss Finch being left to her own resources, continues her untiring efforts to find a man.

AMBROSIO.

THE SHIP OF LIONS (Nov. 6).—The showman needed a trainer for his lions, and when the girl offered herself he engaged her, not only because of her experience in handling the Kings of the Forest, but because she fascinated him. When the perilous cargo of denizens of the jungle had been safely placed amid-ship the showman and the girl went along. While on the cruise the ship picked up a cargo of smuggled gold dust, and when the girl repulsed the showman's attentions, and showed her preference for the captain, the showman incited the crew to mutiny, to secure the gold dust. As the rioting crew charged upon them the girl and the captain dashed below deck; fastening the hatches they sought to escape. Before they dropped into the small dory alongside the girl set the lions free and just as they left the captain fired the ship. Maddened beyond all description, the crew battered open the hatch, to be greeted by flames and smoke, and worst of all, a peril they had little expected. The lions were free. They drove the men into the rigging and as the ship sank the lions dashed over the side of the boat to freedom, while the crew and the showman went to their doom.

BISON.

A RED MAN'S LOVE (Nov. 5).—Lucy, the daughter of Major Brown, takes a ride beyond the stockade. She allows her horse to wander away and it is followed and caught by a young Indian warrior, Swift Deer, who sees her safely back to the fort. He worships the lovely "Pale Face."

The trader, Alden, covets Blue Bird, Red Bear's Squaw, and attempting to make love to her is attacked by the warrior, whom he kills. The Indians swear death to all pale faces and take the war-path. Swift Deer decides to warn the fort, but seeing Lucy in the arms of Corporal Taylor his anger is aroused and he joins his tribe.

The Indians seize their opportunity when a large company start from the garrison on scouting duty. The fort is surprised and hard pressed. Swift Deer digs a trench under the stockade and crawls through, intent upon killing Lucy and Taylor. Lucy sees him and runs to him as a friend. Her ingenuity disarms Swift Deer and he resolves to save her. He leads her through the trench and together they ride away and meet the Major and his company. On the way the Indian sways and falls, and Lucy sees that he has been badly wounded when crawling through the trench. She proceeds alone and meets the cavalry, which dash up to the fort and rescue the decimated garrison. Swift Deer dies happy to have done the Pale Face lady a service.

AN INDIAN ISHMAEL (Nov. 9).—Gray Dove, a squaw, has been a patient and faithful attendant to her Chief. He becomes infatuated with a young squaw, Briar Rose, who desires his whole attention. She persuades the Chief to get rid of Gray Dove. He gives her corn and water and despite her dumb entreaties he casts her out and she wanders out to the big desert with her little son, Red Deer. Hunger and thirst overtakes them and the woman, after giving the boy the last drop of water, folds him in her arms and lies down to await the advent of the Happy Hunting Grounds.

A wagon train happens along and Big Bill and his wife find the child alive, the squaw having gone to await the coming of her son. They pick up the boy and bury the mother.

Ten years pass and Red Deer grows to be a fine type of the educated Indian. He loves the woods and wilds, and one day, whilst setting traps for beavers, he meets the pretty little Indian maiden, Golden Willow. "Like turns to Like" and it is a case of love at first sight.

Outside the fort, guards are watching the horses grazing, when a band of horse thieves ride up, kill the guards and escape with the horses. They sell them to the Indians. The garrison is aroused, ride out, see the horses in the Indian camp, attack it and take a number of the Indians prisoners. Little Golden Willow escapes and meets Red Deer. She tells him the circumstances and together they ride to the fort. The Colonel listens and is convinced. He apologizes to the Chief and releases the Indian prisoners.

Red Deer joins the tribe and asks for and is given Golden Willow for his squaw, and Red Deer is made Chief for his services in saving the Red Men. The spirit of Gray Dove rises above the Happy Hunting Grounds and blesses her son and his mate.

THE BETTER PART (Nov. 5).—Lawrence, the son of wealthy parents meets Miriam on a highway. He is attracted by her beauty and sweetness and upon a second meeting, invites her to the county fair. While they are taking in the exhibits, some of the playful rubes begin throwing confetti and some of it is thrown into Miriam's eyes.

Lawrence takes her home. The country physician is called. He recommends a specialist be sent for. Lawrence persuades Miriam and her mother to allow him to assume the expense. He then goes home and tells his father of his love for Miriam. The father angrily dismisses him. The specialist arrives. Miriam's eyes are bandaged with the strict command that the bandage should not be removed for three days if she is to regain her sight permanently.

Larry, the following day, is thrown from his horse over the edge of a cliff. He grabs hold of some small shrubs and hanging there calls for help. Miriam hears Larry's call and gets up frightened, and gropes her way out of the house. As she draws closer to the place from which the cries had come, she listens intently for a repetition of the cry for help. In great anguish she snatches the bandage from her eyes, sees Larry, grasps his arm and calls for help.

Larry's father, walking down the road, hears her call and rushes to the scene, and he and Miriam together pull Larry up to safe ground. The father turns and calls to Miriam. She turns in the direction of his voice and staggers toward him, for she has become totally blind. The father, realizing the terrible sacrifice she has made for his son, goes to her, takes her in his arms and gives her to Larry and though blind, she snuggles contentedly in Larry's arms.

THE HONOR OF THE FAMILY (Nov. 7).—Claude, the elder brother, is heir to the estates of Sir James. He is a rogue and a spendthrift. Gerald the younger brother leaves England to seek his fortune in America, being the recipient of a remittance at stated intervals. He goes to the mountains and engages in mining. There he meets Marja. Claude comes to visit him, sees the girl, and marks her for his own. Gerald warns him to let the girl alone. Marja consents to a secret marriage and Claude returns to England, promising to come back. Some months later Gerald proposes marriage to the girl and she tells him she has married Claude. Marja does not hear from Claude, but Gerald receives a paper from London announcing the marriage of Claude to a society woman. Marja attempts suicide by throwing herself from an eminence and is found by Gerald, a cripple for life. He purchases a wheel chair that she may get about. Her father dies and Gerald takes her to his cabin.

Gerald receives a letter from his father announcing the death of Claude and calling him home to assume his position as the heir of the estates of Sir James. Gerald places the letter in his pocket together with the newspaper account of the marriage of Claude and decides not to return to England, but to remain and care for the lawful wife of his brother, whom he has grown to love fondly. Sometime afterward he goes to his mine, wheeling the girl along with him. He leaves her after throwing his coat over the arm of his chair. She decides to change her position and the coat falls to the ground. She picks it up and the letter from England and the paper fall out. She reads the announcement of the marriage of Claude and then, feeling justified she reads the letter and of the death of Claude and of Gerald being heir to the estates. In desperation she tries to wheel the chair down the slope and it is over-turned. Her cries bring Gerald and when he comes she shows him the newspaper and the letter. She reaches out her arms to him and is clasped to his heart.

A GALLEY SLAVE'S ROMANCE (Nov. 10).—Jean, a young wood chopper, has a sweetheart, Annette. She is insulted by the grand seigneur of the parish and Jean rebukes him. The dignitary tells his flunkies to thrash Jean, who seizes a gun and drives them from the house. The next day the girl is annoyed by the seigneur and Jean gives him and his head huntsmen a chastisement. A warrant is issued for Jean's arrest, but he evades them, and in his escape is pursued to a cliff on the seigneur's grounds where he encounters the seigneur and hurls him from the cliffs, crippling him. Jean is sentenced to the galleys for life, but wins a pardon through his efforts in saving the prison governor's life during an uprising of the galley slaves. He returns home and a happy reconciliation follows.

THE RAILROAD AND THE WIDOW (Nov. 6).—The T. L. & M. Railroad is building a new branch which is to extend to Alamogordo, New Mexico. The widow Crosby, owns a strip of eight feet of ground which is absolutely necessary for the railroad to secure. The superintendent of the company instructs Bracken the civil engineer to arrange for the purchase of this ground from the widow and if she won't sell, to bluff her out of it. On submitting his proposition to the widow, she refuses to sell for any consideration. Enraged Bracken secures an axe to chop down the fence post and instructs the surveyors to measure off the distance. O'Brien, a young surveyor, who is acting as an assistant, realizes that the railroad land-shark is not acting the part of a gentleman, and he tries to reason with the widow. Convinced that the widow is in the right, he argues with Bracken who discharges him. Bracken starts to tear down the fence, when he is ordered to stop by the widow. He refuses. The widow shoots. Knowing that the railroad corporation will fight the case, for having one of its employes molested in the performance of his duties, the widow's daughter, deliberately fires a shot into her mother's arm, so that she can enter a plea of self-defence.

THE FIRST GLASS (Nov. 8).—A lonesome old woman sat in a cafe lost in dreams of yesterday. It was old Sarah, the belle of long ago, now a victim of drink. At a table near her sat two youths and two girls. One of the girls as her manner showed had trodden the path before. The other, Fritzi, was only just learning. An untouched glass of liquor was on the table before her. She was listening to the urgings of her companions, but she was uncertain—it was her first.

Old Sarah sat and watched the girl and the untouched glass. At last the girl drank. An instinct that had long been smoldered within Old Sarah burst afire again. She had long ago given up her own battle with the beast—drink—but now she would fight to save another. At first her efforts to save the girl seemed futile. She has met only with the chidings and rebukes of the other three, but later, seated beside old Sarah, apart from her companions, the girl bears the warning. Sarah tells her that she, too, once was a beautiful young girl and life was only a long happy dream, until, like the girl, she sipped the wine of a little glass, her first—then it seemed the happiness and sunshine of her life began to slip away. A terrible craving beast had been borne within her at the drinking of that little first glass. It had driven her down and down until it had left her as the girl then saw her. Her story finished—Sarah's battle is won—the inevitable future that awaits her has been pictured to the girl who turns back upon the road she had begun to travel.

UNITED WE STAND (Nov. 4).—Captain Brand, an old Union officer and a ranch owner, visits Los Angeles with his son George, to join the G. A. R. Re-Union. Major Cameron, a retired Confederate officer, is visiting the city with his daughter Eva. They meet in the hotel lobby, and Eva introduces George to her father. The Major draws his daughter away and tells her firmly that he will not allow her to consort with the son of an old Union man.

The following day the Captain and George take their seats in the Grand Stand and prepare to enjoy the procession. The Major and Eva attend, believing there will be a Southern delegation or two in the pageant. Fate ordains that their seats are next to the Captain and his son. The Captain applauds wildly, to the Major's great annoyance, and when the Major sees that there are no confederates in line, he takes it as a personal insult and leaves the grand stand in a huff. Arriving at the hotel, Eva sees her father sleeping in an easy chair, and steals out in the hopes of meeting George.

The Captain returns, and sinking into a chair goes to sleep. George goes after Eva. Each of the veterans dreams and sees a battle field.

The Captain goes to look for George and comes across the young couple, but he has not the heart to interrupt his son's happiness. Not so the Major, who also sees them. He commands his daughter to come with him at once. This so enrages the Captain that he faces the irate Major and proceeds to tell him that his son is good enough for any girl on earth. Explanations follow and the happiness of the young couple follows as a matter of due course.

HIS LITTLE PARTNER (Nov. 6).—John Doming and his two daughters, Eunice and little Tess, arrive in the stage coach with Tom, a miner, Ray, an Easterner, the sheriff and others. The next day the father and daughters start out prospecting. Eunice and Tom promising to see each other again, Tom and Ray form a partnership and start out also. Both parties decide upon a location and start to work. Sometime later, Ray becomes discouraged and decides to leave. They settle up their account, Tom buying Ray's interest. Ray starts back to the stage coach station, where he meets the deputy and sheriff who advise him that Tom has in the meanwhile discovered gold. Ray hastens back. Tom starts to register his claim, but before he can get away, Eunice, who has been taken with fever, arrives with her little sister. The two girls having started out to find their father, who had gone further on, prospecting. Tom insists upon their stopping at his camp until he can get the doctor, but as he comes out to mount his horse, he sees Ray staking out his claim, and realizes that unless he gets to the Register's office, Ray will register the claim in his own name, then he remembers Eunice, so after explaining to little Tess that he will get the doctor at any cost, he rides away. Tess at once tells her sister. Eunice manages to help the child upon their horse, and she rides to the Register's office, arriving just ahead of Ray. The sheriff meets her, registers the claim in Tom's name and both then return to Tom's camp, to find Mr. Doming, Tom and the doctor already there, and Eunice out of danger.

SHARPS AND CHAPS (Nov. 8).—Professor De Risque, anxious to escape for a time the too solicitous attention of Madame De Risque, arrives at Roaring Gulch and, noting that the town numbers some very pretty girls amongst its population, he hangs out his shingle announcing the fact that he teaches the piano and violin. The professor is charming and the young ladies are impressionable, they readily desert the constant cowboys for the professor.

The cowboys get their heads together and plan a counter-move. They hire a music teacher in the person of Mademoiselle Dulcie, and install her in an adjoining office to De Risque. The boys express a preference for the trombone and the clarionette and find that it is necessary to practice hard, especially when the professor is making soulful harmony with one of the village belles.

A twofold crisis occurs. Mademoiselle has all the boys literally at her dainty feet. She sends for her husband, who is a jewelry drummer. He arrives and sells the boys engagement rings at double seaside-resort prices, and after Dulcie has received a proposal and a ring from each of the boys, she departs with her hubby and sends the boys her regards and thanks. Madame De Risque traces the professor and leads him kindly but very firmly home.

SISTERS (Nov. 8).—Annie and Mary are twin orphans, left in charge of an orphanage. Annie is adopted by a middle-class family and Mary is adopted by a wealthy family. Mary marries a wealthy but dissipated clubman, while Annie becomes the wife of a member of the fire department. Mary is afflicted with heart trouble. Annie knowing that her husband needs a new watch, decides to purchase one for his birthday. Her actions in attempting to buy it excite the suspicions of her husband. That day Mary's home catches fire and her husband being away with some male and female friends, leaves the maid all alone with her mistress and who, upon seeing the fire, is panic stricken and rushes out leaving Mary to struggle alone. Heart trouble overpowers her and she falls back on her bed dead. Annie's husband arrives and he mounts the ladder to Mary's room. Breaking through the window he dashes into the room and, seeing a woman on the bed, goes to her. One glance at her and he believes her to be Annie. Carrying her to a place of safety, a physician is summoned, who pronounces Mary dead. The poor fireman staggers away.

Later in the day he wanders home. Annie who sees him coming, conceals herself behind a curtain. He enters his house and crushed by his terrible blow, decides to end his troubles forever by blowing out his brains. Annie comes from her place of concealment and shows him his birthday gift and he, stunned by her unexpected appearance drops the revolver back in the drawer and clasps her in his arms. Annie never knew.

A STRANGE CASE (Nov. 4).—Jim Hanford is a tough character. Although long suspected by the Central office men he has been too clever for them, until one day they almost caught him. He managed to escape them and ran into his house. His daughter, a good girl who had no previous knowledge of her father's evil traits, saw the necklace and threw it out of the window just before the detectives entered the room. After a search which proved fruitless they left and Jim promised his daughter never to steal again. She descended to the street to find the necklace and return it to the owner and was horrified at discovering no traces of it. It had been picked up by Gerald Vaughn, a young clerk who was the sole support of his widowed mother. Not appreciating the true value of his find he put it in the bureau and said nothing to his mother. Shortly after his mother advertised for a dressmaker to dwell with her and the crook's daughter secured the position. The young couple grew to love each other and Gerald proposed. Not having enough money to buy an engagement ring he thought of the found necklace and pawned it. This was seen by the detectives who almost caught her father and they followed him home. He was arrested. This placed the girl in a perplexing position. If she told of her lover finding it it would incriminate her father. Gerald was brought to prison and the detectives made a strong case against him. The girl went to her father and told him of the ruin of her life's pros-

HOW NED GOT THE RAISE (Nov. 9).—Ned Elliott, a young clerk, is engaged to be married. His salary is not large enough to support a wife and he asks his employer for a "raise," which is refused. The same thing occurs several times, and with each refusal Ned postpones his marriage. In despair he concocts a scheme to make his employer give him the coveted "raise." He takes a bright young maid who works at his boarding house into his confidence.

Knowing that Mr. Hadley, his employer, is a flirt, and that Mrs. Hadley is extremely jealous, Ned plans to have Mary, the maid, come to Hadley's office and declare herself his (Hadley's) wife. Ned arranges it so that Mrs. Hadley arrives on the scene at the same time. A series of most laughable incidents follow Mary's entrance in Hadley's office, ending with Ned getting his "raise." But the raise is such that—well—it would spoil the splendid finish of the story to tell it. Suffice to say that a real comedy surprise is furnished the auditor and Ned as well, as his co-conspirator, Mary, are rewarded in a manner that justifies the undertaking of trying to "raise" Ned's salary.

A TRAMP'S STRATEGY (Nov. 4).—Julia, the daughter of Hiram Blackmore, a farmer, is in love with Bob Moore, a salesman. Mr. and Mrs. Blackmore oppose the match, as they desire Sam Mercer, a country lad, to become their son-in-law. The next time when Bob calls he is put out of the house, whereupon he and Julia decide to elope. They repair to an orchard, where they lay out their plans, but in doing so, are overheard by a friendly tramp, who tells them of a scheme to get into the good graces of Mr. Blackmore. In the execution of the plot, the tramp takes Bob to a ramshackle country house, where he binds Bob hand and foot. This is witnessed by Mr. Blackmore, who hurries for the sheriff and his posse. In due time they arrive and rescue Bob. Mr. Blackmore's heart is touched by the apparent weakened condition of Bob, and he takes him to his home, where he recuperates. Still following out the tramp scheme, Bob tells Julia that it would not be fair to the old man if he and Julia were to elope. This conversation is overheard by Mr. Blackmore, who immediately withdraws his objection. Bob and Julia are married by Parson Jamison, who happens to be passing the house. In the meantime the sheriff and his men arrive with the tramp. When Bob tells his father-in-law that he was only following out a scheme of the tramp's in order to get into the family, the old man's anger knows no bounds, but the humor of the situation appeals to him, and he gives the young people his blessings.

HER MASTERPIECE (Nov. 9).—Prince Orloff of the Russian nobility, has two handsome and talented daughters in Marinka and Sonia. Marinka, who is an artist of great ability, is happy in the reciprocal love of Waldimar, a nobleman. Sonia also loves the nobleman and is very jealous of her sister.

One day Sonia, upon returning home from riding, finds that the Moscow Fine Arts Exhibition has accorded her sister first prize for the painting. This intensifies Sonia's anger and jealousy to such an extent that when the day arrives for the awarding of prizes, which is to take place before a notable assemblage, she instructs Ivon, the groom, to pour a bottle of solution over the picture, which will ruin it. The groom follows Sonia's instructions, and when the curtain which hangs in front of the

THE ADVENTUROUS ADOPTION (Nov. 13).—Our young friend Jimmie forms a sudden attachment for a little waif in the streets whom he finds playing an accordion for alms. The little urchin late that night rises from his pallet and goes to serenade his new friend. Jimmie makes a rope of the bed-clothes up which clambers the ragged Archie. Disregarding the formalities of undressing Jimmie puts Archie in his own immaculate bed, dirty shoes and all, while he himself sleeps upon the mat like a faithful Towser. In the morning Jimmie hides Archie in a closet until he should have returned from school. In the evening when he arrives, the key to the closet is missing. There is an interchange of notes and Archie directs Jimmie to go to his nefarious companions who have the somewhat sinister occupation of second story men and tell them of Archie's imprisonment. The two rascals come as requested and with alacrity they tie Jimmie to the bed and prepare to rob the house, when the redoubtable Archie upsets the closet upon the bold pair, pinning them to the floor. Archie then releases Jimmie. A policeman arrives at the propitious moment and collars the two miscreants, whereupon Archie is dubbed a real fellow and is adopted therewith.

THE PRICE OF PARADISE (Nov. 14).—Evelyn and Raymond are happy in their reciprocal love in spite of Evelyn's mother's strong objections to her entertaining the thoughts of marriage with a poor man. The mother has ambitions to see her daughter wedded to a husband of wealth. When Mr. Varnier visits the Inn conducted by the mother and shows a strong partiality for Evelyn, the designing parent coerces Evelyn into becoming Mrs. Varnier. Raymond, of course, has his heart sadly rent and as the automobile wheels away carrying the bride and bridegroom-elect and the covetous mother, Raymond attempts to stop them but he is pushed aside.

The bride takes little satisfaction in her palatial surroundings. She is ever dreaming of her loved and lost sweetheart. A spray of iris given to her adds to her dejection by reminding her of the happy past when the lovers gathered them on the sunlit river.

Mr. Varnier is a man of many travels. In the course of one of these journeys he is killed. At the reading of his will it is learned that though he bequeaths all his property to his wife, she will forfeit it if she marries again. It is a hard alternative, but out of the mental struggle comes the resolution to forget all of the luxuries and brave her mother's anger and return to her lover of yesterday. Putting on the rude clothes which she wore the day she left her home to become Mrs. Varnier, she flees from the mansion. By the river she finds the dejected Raymond still mourning the cupidity that had lost him his adored.

AMERICAN.

GOD'S UNFORTUNATE (Nov. 7).—A new start in life is grand—sublime if carried to a successful finish. What's the use—everybody is against me. The poet says, "Let the dead past bury its dead." This sentiment is beautifully illustrated in the life of Mabel Green, and you will experience many thrills as you follow Mabel in her struggles for supremacy over a troublesome past career.

MAN'S CALLING (Nov. 11).—Man's vocation is not always one of choice, it is more often one of circumstances. This story illustrates the fallacy of parents selecting, without regard to the natural inclination or ability of the child, a line of pursuit or means of livelihood, which accounts for the large number of dismal failures in life. In this instance the father of John Wallace, prompted by his religious fervor, urges the boy to enter a monastery. John obligingly acquiesces and starts on the journey, but later changes his mind, seeks employment on a farm and subsequently marries. Old man Wallace often meditates about his boy and watches the pilgrimages of the padres, hoping to get a glimpse of his son. John finally visits his father, in company with his wife and child. The disappointment of the father is intense but the sight of his grandchild softens his heart and he yields to nobler sentiment.

THE INTRUSION AT LOMPOC (Nov. 14).—Lompoc, a quiet little inland town, moves peacefully along from week to week with little more excitement than the flutter of the leaves. The stage-coach rolls up to the one hotel each day and the usual quota of visitors arrive and depart with mechanical precision until one day a typical gambler, of pleasing manner, appeared and wrought consternation in the heart of a number of fair sex, aroused the jealousy of the local swains and the undying hatred of a former victim. There was a period of excitement entirely foreign to the little community of home lovers. When the excitement was over there were a few sadder folk in Lompoc, a few more ardent lovers, the town had rid itself of a great evil, which promised to undermine the welfare of the community, the atmosphere of Lompoc had been purified and the old rhythm was resumed.

JIM BENTLEY'S ADVENTURE (Nov. 16).—Jim Bentley and his little daughter, while seeking a new home in the West, come across an abandoned cabin which they occupy. Bright Star, a pretty Indian girl, is often with the little girl and a genuine attachment grows up between them. One day in town Bright Star is insulted by Black Bill, a local bully. Jim Bentley, riding into town that day, sees the incident and severely trounces Black Bill, thereby gaining the everlasting enmity of Bill and furnishing much delight to the loungers about the store.

Black Bill avenges himself by stealing the daughter of Bentley. The latter gives immediate chase with the aid of Bright Star. Separating about the outlaw's camp, Bright Star takes one direction and Bentley the other. Black Bill, rushing into the bushes at a noise, captures Bright Star. During the scuffle, Bently overpowers the two confederates, seizes his child and hurries to the edge of a dangerous precipice. Meanwhile, Bright Star, fighting Black Bill, obtains possession of his gun and by holding him up, makes her escape to town for a posse. During this period, Bentley, seeing no other mode of escape climbs down a dangerous rock with the girl tightly holding him about the neck. The outlaws are unable to get down to him there and patiently wait.

Bright Star then returns with the posse who capture Black Bill and his two friends. They are then faced by the awful problem of getting Jim Bentley to earth safely. Bentley is so situated on the shelving rock that he can neither go up nor come down. All attempts to throw a rope up to him prove unavailing. In this frightful emergency, Bright Star has an idea. She calls up to him to unravel the little girl's woolen stocking. This he does letting the long skein of yarn over the precipice so that the rope can be attached to it. In this unique way, Jim Bentley and child are rescued.

A MAGNETIC PERSONALITY (Nov. 8).—Weary Gussie steals a large case of magnets and immediately becomes possessed of a power to attract sundry metal objects which come his way. The power is not a very great asset and Gussie has sundry adventures of a magnetic nature which cause him more sorrow than profit.

SPIFFKINS EATS FROGS (Nov. 8).—The amusing adventures of a young man who dines on frogs. He becomes most frog-like in his movements, to the consternation of all beholders.

RELIANCE.

THE FAITH HEALER (Nov. 13).—John Morton, who loses his eyesight, discovers that his wife loves another man, who returns her affection. Rather than spoil her happiness and realizing that she no longer cares for him, he goes away, that she may get a divorce and be free. Alone, he wanders into the mountains, where he is found by a girl named Jess, who, seeing that he is blind, takes him to her father's cabin. Morton develops an ability to cure the poor simple mountain folk by praying over them. They have faith in him and his prayers and he never fails them. He becomes famous all through the mountains as the Faith Healer. Richard Mason, the man Morton's former wife is now married to, is stricken with paralysis. His wife takes him to a sanitarium in the mountains in the hope of having him cured. It so happened that this place is located very near where Morton is performing his wonderful miracle. Jess, seeing the sick man, suggests to his wife that she send for Morton. Without knowing whom it is, he is called upon to heal. Morton starts for the sanitarium. His former wife recognizes him, but fearing that he will recognize her voice, she keeps quiet. But the Faith Healer soon finds out his patient's identity. He opens his Bible and prays, but the man, who was not a believer, and who's life was not simple and good like the mountain people, dies as he reads the last verse.

THE VIRGIN OF THE FIRE (Nov. 16).—During the cave man period, some 20,000 years ago, Myrh, a virgin of the tribe in charge of the sacred fire, meets Wanah, a young warrior belonging to another tribe. She flees through the woods with Wanah in hot pursuit. He falls down a cliff and is hurt. Myrh looks down and sees him lying unconscious. She drags him into the cave, where he is attended. During his convalescence, she explores the neighborhood and sees a tribe of small eaters crawling among the rocks and preparing to attack the small group of women left alone in the caves. Wanah, in the meantime, comes to the rescue and is injured. When he recovers, he hears that Myrh was taken by the black men. Regardless of his injuries he follows, and, hiding behind some bushes, he throws his spears at them, frightening them so that they run away, leaving the girl. Wanah is about to make off with her when the black men discover he is alone, and return to the fight. He bids the girl run away and decides to sacrifice his life for her. The girl meets her own tribe and urges them to hurry back to Wanah's rescue. There is a fierce battle, after which the tribe of black men is exterminated. Upon the death of the old chief, Wanah is elected to his place and he selects Myrh as his bride.

MAJESTIC.

HIS COOK LADY (Nov. 10).—Bill Williams is a crank, and finds fault with his wife continually. Her cooking dirives him into a rage, and he tells her to hire a cook. Spike Jones, an ex-prize fighter, looks in the morning paper for a job and copies Williams' address in mistake. When Mrs. Williams tells him she wants a cook who will teach her bully of a husband a lesson, he makes a bargain with her to dress up as a woman, and act as her cook.

Williams arrives home and kicks because his dinner is not ready. His cook "lady" makes him eat dishes that nearly choke him, but he is afraid to refuse. By the time "Spike" is through with him he is so cowed that his little wife has no trouble managing him.

THE DEACON'S SHOES (Nov. 10).—The deacon's wife persuades him to buy a new pair of shoes, but he refuses to allow her to throw his old ones away. A tramp calls at the house and tells such a sad hard luck story, that she gives him the shoes. He sits down behind a barn to put them on, leaving his old shoes on the ground. Before he has walked far, the shoes hurt his feet so that he takes them off and carries them in his hand. He steals a chicken from a farm yard and drops the deacon's shoes in his flight. The farmers have had so many chickens stolen that they put blood hounds on the thief's track, using the shoes as a clue. The blood hounds lead the farmers up to the back door of the deacon's house and he is accused of chicken stealing. His wife confesses that she gave his old shoes to a tramp and the dogs are put on the right track. The tramp is finally caught as he is about to make a hearty meal of the chicken, and the deacon is vindicated.

DICK AND DAISY (Nov. 13).—Dick and Daisy are a young married couple. Dick, through lack of business, loses his good position. Daisy and he decide to discharge the maid. Daisy's first meal is a failure. She is angry because Dick will not eat the food.

They make up and he wants to press his suit. She says she will do it for him, but burns it terribly. He is provoked at this and goes out of the house. She looks for work and gets a job answering the telephone. That day Dick meets an old friend of his who has a job for him. It is as office manager with the same people who have hired Daisy. He, getting the position, has occasion to call on the 'phone. He recognizes his wife's voice. He goes out into the outer office and discovers Daisy. He sends her out a slip with the words, "You are discharged" upon it. There is nothing for her to do but go home. Dick arrives and everything is made up.

THE PRODIGAL WIFE (Nov. 13).—Mrs. James Clements moves in society. Her husband indulges her extravagances until she demands $500,00. He gives her the money, but she notices that he does so under silent protest. This makes her think. Her thoughts are thrown on the screen. She sees her stock-broker husband on the verge of bankruptcy through her own extravagance. In a last attempt to save himself he plays the cotton market and is ruined. He commits suicide in order that his wife may be protected with his heavy life insurance. He leaves a letter telling her that her extravagance has ruined him. When she realizes that his blood is on her hands she is overcome with remorse and loses her reason, dying a raving maniac in an insane asylum. Mrs. Clements shakes off this nightmare and with a sigh of relief resolves to change her mode of life.

FLESH AND BLOOD (2 reels) (Nov. 15).—Barnes, a detective, is told to trace and capture the thief in a great jewel robbery, although he is given no traceable clue. He goes home and tells his wife of the important assignment. She is quite elated over this, but their son, Stephen, receives the news nervously. He goes to his room. Both father and mother are surprised at their son's queer actions. The father goes and looks through the key-hole of the door leading to Stephen's room. He sees him put some valuable jewels into a violin case. The father, pounding on the door, frightens his son and he makes his escape through a window.

Barnes breaks down the door and trails his son successfully to the den of a "fence," (a man who buys stolen goods) The "fence," however helps Stephen escape through the scuttle to the roof of the next house. Barnes is not outwitted, and he continues until he catches sight of his son on the edge of a tin cornice. He shoots and his son falls four stories, the fall being broken by pulley lines, awnings, etc.

Stephen is brought home apparently in a dying condition. Mrs. Barnes reprimands her husband for having attempted to murder their son in the pursuit of duty. Barnes is grief-stricken and, going to his superiors, gives himself up, assuming the responsibility for his son's crime. After several months Stephen is convalescing. He hears of the trial of his father, comes forward, confesses all and thereby exonerates him.

ON SECRET SERVICE (2 reels—Nov. 1).—Fred Martin is a Southern spy. A northern despatch bearer is captured, and the signature to his messages is forged and Martin is sent on the dangerous mission of luring the Northern troops into an ambush. He accomplishes this, and a terrible battle results, in which the Federals are driven back. The work of Martin is so damaging to the North that plans are laid for his capture, and John Bruce, a secret service man, is assigned to the task. He goes to Martin's home town and presents a forged letter of introduction to the Martins, purporting to be signed by Fred Martin. He is welcomed into the home and to further his ends makes love to Anna Martin.

While in the Martin home the Northern troops surround the house and Bruce, fearing that his plans to capture Martin will fail if the field is not left clear for him to return, is compelled to make himself known to the Northern officer. Fred Martin is expected on a visit that night, so Bruce shows his credentials as a secret service man and instructs the soldiers to secrete themselves about the house. In bidding good-bye to Anna he drops the passport, and she learns the awful truth.

Anna has been expecting her brother, and has given the signal—a candle in the window—that the coast was clear. Gun in hand, Bruce awaits Fred, and the anguished girl sees the spy in the moonlight, crouching behind a bush.

Galloping towards home, Fred is surprised on a bridge by two northern sentries. Dismounting, he hands them a pass hoping they will be deceived by the northern uniform he is wearing. In swift succession he delivers crushing blows upon the faces of the sentries, and they tumble off the bridge into the water, and leaping on his horse he gallops away. With swift strokes one of the sentries gets to shore, and leveling his rifle takes a quick shot at Fred as he goes around a bend in the road, little thinking it will hit the mark. Fred's horse is struck, and leaping into the air it turns a complete somersault backwards and falls on Fred. Crushed and hurt, Fred extricates himself from the dying animal, and crawls away. The delay has saved him, for the northern soldiers awaiting him give him up in the early hours of the morning, and when Fred drags himself to the door he is unobserved.

Anna and her mother put Fred to bed. In his wounded condition he is helpless, and Anna realizes that he must be captured unless she saves him. Attempting to leave the house, her way is barred by a northern sentry. Donning her brother's clothes she manages to effect her escape, and leaping on a horse gallops swiftly away.

Bruce has determined upon a bold stroke, and impersonating Fred he goes to the union colonel and tells him a detachment of southern soldiers is nearby, and attempts to lead the northern soldiers into an ambush. In the meantime Anna is making a wild ride, sparing neither the horse nor herself, and she arrives in time to bare Bruce's plot, and accuse him. On her part, Anna has fallen desperately in love with Bruce, and he has lost his heart to the brave girl, but each buries personal feeling for the sake of their respective countries.

Bruce is arrested and quickly tried and convicted of being a spy. He is led out in the field, and a dozen soldiers face him with leveled rifles. Anna sees the impending execution and with an agonized scream darts across the field, but the rifles thunder a volley and the man she loves falls dead. The picture ends with Anna sobbing over the dead secret service man.

WHEN LEE SURRENDERS (2 reels) (Nov. 8).—There is a fierce battle raging between the Union and Confederate soldiers outside of Nellie Morton's home, and when the Southern boys show signs of weakening, her Southern heart is stirred by the sight. Captain Blake of the Union forces, is wounded by a bursting shell, but he manages to crawl to the Morton lawn, where he falls exhausted. He is found by Nellie, who at first levels a pistol at his head, commanding him to move on. He painfully rises, and the suppressed look of pain, and the wound in his forehead have such an effect upon Nellie's heart that she brings him into the house, where he is nursed.

With the setting sun a cessation of the hostilities between the two armies are brought, and the Confederate soldiers camp near the Morton home. The Confederate officers are seen approaching and Blake is told to hide upstairs. But the officers find the Yankee's coat and Nellie is forced to admit to having Blake in hiding. In the meantime, however, Blake, who has heard the conversation, escapes by an open window. Outside he knocks the sentry senseless and dons his gray uniform. His escape is discovered, and the Confederate officers rush outside and past him, not recognizing him in his Southern uniform.

The next day Blake's coat is found by a company of Union officers, and old Morton is accused of having killed a Yankee officer. He is thrown into prison. In the meantime, Blake manages to reach his company, and encounters the Confederates at a bridge, where a fierce conflict takes place, the Union men being victorious in the end.

As Blake is returning to the colonel to report the victory, he meets Nellie at the door, who had come to plead for her father's life. She tells him the story and he secures her father's pardon. Blake asks Nellie to marry him and she says, "When Lee surrenders." After the war, at his mother's home, he receives a letter from Nellie, saying, "Lee has surrendered." And we all know what that means.

MARY OF THE MINES (Nov. 13).—Mary is the daughter of a prospector, who works a claim without success. Hale, a young miner, falls in love with Mary, and he performs many acts of kindness. Mary hesitates to accept Hale's offer of marriage, owing to a previous attachment she has had for Jack Norton, in the East. Her father is fatally injured by a landslide, and on his death-bed asks Mary to marry Hale, which she does. Later, Norton appears and persuades her that she would be happier in the East. She decides to leave Hale, but his generosity in equally dividing his gold with her rather shakes her determination. Norton steals Hale's gold, and as Mary goes to the bank in the settlement to exchange her nuggets for coin, she sees Norton ahead of her and recognizes the bag. Calling the sheriff, she denounces Norton, and, brought to a realization of her husband's goodness, she effects a touching reconciliation.

KEYSTONE

THE DEACON'S TROUBLES (Nov. 11).—The deacon is a reformer, and is appointed the head of the Purity League, composed of the old maids of the town. A poster of a dancer is condemned by the league. The deacon goes to an amusement park and there sees the original of the poster standing on a platform during a ballyhoo, and sneaks in and gets a front seat. The dancer's efforts are met with a storm of applause from the deacon, who meets the girl after the show and becomes badly smitten, and in a moment of weakness is persuaded to have his tintype taken with the girl in costume.

Some time later the show hits the deacon's home town, and the Purity League tries to prevent the performance. The arguments with the management reach an exciting stage, when the girl comes up and shows the picture of the deacon. The leaguers turn upon him, strip him of his badge and assist his wife in teaching him a thorough lesson.

A TEMPERAMENTAL HUSBAND (Nov. 11).—Brown is temperamental—and jealous. He goes to business and tips the maid to watch his wife. In his absence his wife's brother calls, whom he has never seen. The maid, spying, sees the affectionate greeting of the brother and sister, and runs to town to tell Brown.

Mrs. Brown has turned away an evil-looking tramp, and when her little girl does not respond to her calls, she jumps at the conclusion that the little one has been kidnapped, and calls the police, who make haste to reach the Brown home on bicycles. In the meantime, however, the child returns home.

After many difficulties Brown gets to his house, and, peeping through the window sees his wife sitting on her brother's lap. Drawing a revolver, he is about to shoot the unknown man when the police arrive. In fear and trembling they approach Brown, who has picked up his little girl, and whom they think is the kidnapper. Brown is captured and beaten unconscious with clubs. When he comes to he sees his wife and her brother standing over him and makes a dash for the brother. Explanations are quickly made, and he then turns upon the police and gives them a dose of the same medicine they gave him.

police suspect. He loses his pocketbook which is picked up by the latter. The police are notified of the loss and a detective overhears an incriminating conversation. He is about to arrest Charlie, who escapes.

The broker is in despair, the client having demanded the return of the securities. "Handsome Charlie," urged by his lady friend, also an acquaintance of the broker's, restores the pocketbook. He is persuaded by the broker to obtain the pledged securities by handing a spurious draft in exchange, which he does, but he is tempted by the contents of the safe and in defending his property the moneylender is fatally injured. "Handsome Charlie" runs away, hands the broker the documents and, after disguising himself, makes his way to the railway station. Losing the last train, he seeks refuge at the house of his female friend. The place is raided. The hunted man once more gets away. The police are now close on his track in a leap from a roof into the water, crawls along the telephone wires and plunges into the sea from a moving cantilever bridge. He is finally run to earth and the city is ridded of its big game.

ITALA.

SOULS IN TORTURE — Lydia the daughter of a ruined broker, is tricked into marrying the Marquis de Rosa to save her widowed mother from poverty. After marriage she meets her husband's secretary and the two are subsequently attracted to each other by an irresistible influence. Count Bernardi is also an admirer of the Marchioness and seeks to win favor in her eyes but without success. At an elaborate ball, given in honor of the Marchioness, the attentions shown her by Frank, the young secretary, do not escape the Count, who swears vengeance after being rebuffed by Lydia. Despite her fondness for Frank, the Marchioness succeeds in preserving her own and her husband's honor even though her movements are at times suspicious in the extreme. The Count, determined on revenge, watches Lydia and Frank enter a building together and hastens to apprise the Marquis, who discovers the pair through a system of prearranged signals and the apparent wreck of an automobile.

Lydia has written a drama founded on the lives of herself and Frank. After an exciting fox hunt in which a half hundred or more horses and riders participate she retires tired and weary to a secluded apartment, where she and the young secretary proceed to complete the drama. The Marquis bursts in upon the pair and demands an explanation, which Lydia refuses to give and she haughtily leaves the room. Her aged, but thoroughly aroused husband turns to confront Frank and threatens him with a revolver. The young man calmly points to the manuscript on the table before them and his eyes tell the Marquis to read its contents. Scene after scene is unfolded as the old man feverishly runs through the drama until he finally realizes his wife does not love him even though she has fulfilled her duty as such and retained her honor. Frank subsequently hands in his resignation to the Marquis, who arranges a last meeting between Lydia and the young secretary. Unseen the old man overhears all that happens and watches the struggle for love or honor as the final farewell is spoken. Suddenly a loud report is heard in an adjoining room. Lydia and Frank fling wide the portieres and there behold the vanquished Marquis, a victim of his own folly, dead by his own hand.

UNION FEATURES.

RIP VAN WINKLE (2 reels) (Oct. 20).—REEL ONE—Rip Van Winkle was a simple, good-natured fellow and a kind neighbor to all. But he was a hen-pecked husband. Dame Van Winkle was undeniably justified in her outbursts. Perhaps it was the fact that he knew he deserved to be chased and pounded by her hard-worked broom that always caused him to come smilingly out from periods of punishment. He was a lax soul in regard to money accounts. When he saw them coming with their bills in hand, he would hunt his favorite and successful hiding-place, under the kitchen table, trusting to Dame Van Winkle to secure a further extension of payment.

The village money lender calls for his overdue payment on mortgage. As usual Rip has retreated beneath the table. There is no money with which to pay him and the lender leaves them, threatening drastic ends. Dame Van Winkle grows really angry. Rip must go to work, and by way of enforcing her mandate, she gets her trusty broom and rains blow after blow upon the back of the escaping Rip. He reaches the village inn and feels secure among those of his sex. But even to this stronghold comes Dame Van Winkle and Rip is led away by the ear. The following day while his wife is away to the village store, Rip takes his gun and a bit of lunch and goes up into the mountains to hunt. Higher and higher he climbs. Suddenly he comes upon an old man. The stranger frightened Rip, but himself was unafraid of Rip. He even commanded Rip to carry his keg of wine, which command he obeyed. On he followed behind the stranger till at last they met a crowd of men. They were playing ten-pins. When the men commanded him to serve them wine, he obeyed. He was told to take a flagon to their cave and he started. Down the mountainside he went and being unobserved, he put the flagon to his lips. He was naturally a thirsty soul and he drank deep and hearty in a single quaff. He became sleepy, he lay down and was soon asleep.

REEL TWO—Down in the village Rip was missed from his home and his routine haunts. Curiosity as to where he might be grew into anxiety as he failed to appear. And how like a woman, Dame Van Winkle is now most anxious of all. A big searching party is formed and up into the mountains they go, calling for Rip, but no answer comes save an occasional echo. Days pass and he does not return. Each day gone lessens both their curiosity and Dame Winkle's anxiety, till at last she resignedly abandons hope of Rip's return. Now follow those famous twenty years through which Rip slept. Years in which he contentedly dreamed of the goblinmen and witches, of village belles and dancing fairies. Now then his awakening. "Surely," thought Rip as he rubbed his eyes, "I have not slept all night." He didn't notice the leaves that fell away from him nor did his long whiskers come to his attention. Slowly he wends his way down the mountainside till he came to the river road. It seemed quite odd to Rip to meet so many strangers, and why did they all start back in fear when they noticed him?

He struck first for home. Without knocking, he entered. His home looked different. Dame Van Winkle appeared and cried in alarm. Some one appears from another room and Rip is driven out before the broom as he was just twenty years before. A young lady follows him. She feels instinctively drawn to this strange old man. She is Rip's daughter.

Down to the inn Rip wanders. There all is changed. He asks for those who were wont to meet him there and is told they are dead. He asks them if they don't remember Rip Van Winkle, and for the first time he learns he has been dead for twenty years.

An old witch appears and she readily recognizes Rip. Now that his identity is established he repairs home and into the arms of Dame Winkle and his grown-up children.

SOMETHING NEW IN PITTSBURGH

WE have complied with the wishes of many Pennsylvania exhibitors and have opened in Pittsburgh a branch office of THE FEATURE FILM CO. OF NEW YORK, the oldest feature film exchange in existence. Not only the oldest, but the fairest and squarest. It is known all over the country as A REAL FEATURE FILM EXCHANGE; one that selects only the best from the best of the European and American markets. We are always looking out for the interests of our regular customers, with a full realization that THE EXHIBITOR IS THE BULWARK OF THE BUSINESS. Let us hear from you, Ohio Valley Exhibitors, when you want a reliable feature service. Elegant and attractive advertising matter for all features supplied five days before date of exhibition.

MR. EXHIBITOR: LEARN MORE ABOUT THE FOTOPLAYER

Many elements enter into the success or failure of your business, but none of them so important as the class of music you give your patrons with the pictures—nothing detracts so much from beauty of an imaginary scene as does music that is absolutely not in harmony with its setting.

With the ordinary Automatic Musical Instruments, everything is at variance—you are just as apt to have a rag-time melody with a death scene as a hymn with a comedy scene.

With a Fotoplayer installed in your Theatre all this will be eliminated—THE THRILL FOR THE PICTURE, which is so necessary, IS SUPPLIED WITH FOTOPLAYER MUSIC.

All FOTOPLAYERS are equipped with the WONDERFULLY SIMPLE and EXCLUSIVE "DOUBLE-TRACKER DEVICE," which permits the change of music to harmonize with the picture at all times—permits your giving to your patrons the highest ideal in music.

FOTOPLAYERS use ordinary player piano music rolls that may be purchased at any music store, at prices ranging from 50c per roll and upwards.

Every known mechanical accessory for producing imitative effects (known technically as "traps") that can add to the effect of your picture, is incorporated in the FOTOPLAYER. It is absolutely mechanically perfect.

With the FOTOPLAYER you can give your patrons the finest of classical music, grand opera, or the latest popular songs, marches and two-steps, etc.

Any desired part of one roll of music may be played while the other is automatically rewinding—one roll of music may be played and while it is playing, by simply pressing a little lever, the other roll may be brought down to any particular place in the roll you might mark for playing a certain scene in the picture—the FOTOPLAYER furnishes music for every scene—music to bring out the beautiful thoughts of the people on the canvass—music to bring tears to the eyes of your patrons with a pathetic scene—music to bring smiles of amusement on their faces with a comedy scene.

The brilliancy of the piano with its magnificent bells is instantly stilled to the beautiful tones of the organ—the roaring of the cannon and rattle of musketry and beating of drums, in a thrilling battle scene, so aptly depicted by the FOTOPLAYER changes instantly to the sad music so necessary for accompanying the scene showing the wounded and the dying and the sad home-coming. The right class of music so necessary for accompanying the scene, showing the anguish of the mother letting her dear ones go to battle, is supplied by the FOTOPLAYER.

No pen can properly tell you of the possibilities of this wonderful instrument—no argument can begin to tell you of the amount of real dollars will bring you in your business, because of the FOTOPLAYER being installed in your Theatre.

MR. EXHIBITOR: Use good common sense—if you want absolutely the only practicable and durable instrument that will play at all times proper music for your pictures, drop us a line, stating seating capacity of your house, and we will advise you what particular style instrument would be best suited for your needs.

FOTOPLAYERS cost money—they are not a cheap instrument but—THE FOTOPLAYER WILL MAKE MONEY FOR YOU.

OUR PLATFORM

PLANK 3. It has been called to our attention a great many times that a large number of people refrain from attending moving picture theatres because of the eye strain and glare that is so hard on one's eyes, especially where they are inclined to be weak. No doubt, there is hardly a manager but what has had to meet this complaint some time or other.

The RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN is so constructed as to overcome this trouble. Its underlying base gives an invisible golden hue that in no wise changes the black and white; it supplies a wonderful amount of light and illumination to your picture, but still it is possible to show pictures on the lowest amount of amperage. This statement is based on reports from bona fide purchasers. Thus being a practical screen, it still retains its place as the most economical.

We are the originators of the RADIUM GOLD FIBRE SCREEN; watch others try to follow our paths. Our experience is certainly valuable.

"LITTLE JACK BECOMES A COWBOY"

Value Received

Sheriff Johnson stakes Whitridge to cash for a prospecting expedition and is to receive half the profits if they strike gold. The sheriff dies leaving a little son, and Whitridge, having struck riches, decides to ignore the agreement. Years later he refuses Cowboy Jack permission to marry his daughter. Jack produces the sharing agreement, for he is none other than the Sheriff's son. Whitridge is undone, but Jack cheerfully relinquishes all claims in lieu of the paternal blessing, and all agree "Value Received."

OUR PRODUCT

Power's Cameragraph No. 6A

The Result: The Perfect Moving Picture Machine

POWER'S NO. 6A—our latest model—has advanced the moving picture machine to the highest known point of mechanical excellence. It is simply perfect as well as perfectly simple, both in the adjustments of its mechanism and the ease of operation.

It will work 365 days in the year, and the last day will find it there, on the job.

Another thing: A POWER'S NO. 6A can be run at any speed desired; slow, without creating flicker, or high speed without causing undue additional wear on the parts.

Our patented loop setter device (costing but $10.00 extra) removes one of the most annoying obstacles known to moving picture projection. It resets the lower loop automatically without stopping the machine, thus DOING AWAY WITH THE DARK SCREEN AND BROKEN PICTURES.

THIS DEVICE IS FOUND ONLY IN POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH

THE THANHOUSER THREE-A-WEEK

Sunday, Nov. 17

FRANKFURTERS AND QUAIL

"A trip to Coney Island for———cents!" That can be one way of billing this reel, but the main featuring should be of the fine problem it presents. "Where were they happiest?"—rich or poor—as part of "the crowd," or lonely in a mansion?

Tuesday, Nov. 19

MISS TAKU OF TOKIO

She was a Geisha and a visiting American wooed and won her. But when he took her to "God's country" with him, his family and friends couldn't "see" her. She resented their "recognition" of her, and went back to Japan. It was the great test of HIS love for her.

Friday, Nov. 22

"CROSS YOUR HEART"

The Young Thanhouserites put this picture over, the Kid, the Kidlet and Leland Benham. It's All-Star-Kid-Kast! Aside from the cuteness of the principals, there is a strong moral in the film. It is proof positive that dishonesty doesn't pay. It is interesting proof, too.

And as for features—NEXT!

The Forest Rose

Friday, Nov. 29
In 2 reels.

A realistic filmatization of EMERSON BENNETT'S thrilling story of pioneer days in the West.

THE AXE!

ESSANAY'S WONDERFUL EDUCATIONAL SUBJECT BOOKED THIS WEEK!

Released Tuesday, Nov. 12th.

"FROM THE SUBMERGED"

Another subtle, tense, superb dramatic masterpiece portrayed by the Essanay Eastern players. Ruth Stonehouse, E. H. Calvert and Dolores Cassinelli featured. A photoplay for long remembrance.

Released Wednesday, Nov. 13th.

"THE HOUSE OF PRIDE"

Francis X. Bushman, Beverly Bayne, John Steppling and E. H. Calvert in a powerful dramatic study. The struggle of a young city purchasing agent against the corrupt influence of the modern "machine." A distinct feature production!

Released Thursday, Nov. 14th.

"CUTTING CALIFORNIA REDWOODS"

Essanay's wonderful educational subject, showing the giant redwood forests of California under the axe. This film, produced under the personal direction of Mr. G. M. Anderson, is unquestionably one of the greatest scenic masterpieces ever booked!

Released Friday, Nov. 15th.

"MR. UP'S TRIP TRIPPED UP"

A fine farce comedy, involving complications of the funiously funny brand—distinctly a la Essanay. Howard Missimer, Wm. Bailey, Lily Branscombe and E. H. Calvert in the thickest of the melee!

Released Saturday, Nov. 16th.

"'ALKALI' IKE'S CLOSE SHAVE"

Augustus Carney, the world's funniest comedian, in another of this popular Western series, originated by G. M. Anderson. "Alkali" leaves his happy ranch, visits the great city and what happens to him is plenty. A positive volcano of hilarity!

Reel Reasons—Film Facts. Heralds, Lobby Display Posters 1, 3 and 6 Sheet

A story to bring back the thrills of childhood when in the flickering firelight you sat with bated breath and staring eyes, listening to the tales about hollow-voiced, sheet-robed ghosts; of goblins with ghoulish laughter who appear when the Storm King beats upon the pane and the window shutter creaks ominously as it flaps against the ivy-clad stones; the broomstick-riding witch who eats little boys; of the ghastly spirits of the dead which float through the graveyard, their weird whisperings echoing unearthly among the clammy-cold tombstones.

THE unseen hand of a spirit avenger that comes from its immortality of two thousand years to wreak wrath upon the holders of a ring sacrilegiously taken from a mummy. For more than a century's length it brings violent death and destruction through agency of plague, the strangler, poison, bullet and the wreck of aeroplane and automobile. The diabolism contained in a talisman of tragedy. A token of the state marital which mocks at life and love. The sorrows of those whom "unmerciful disaster, followed fast and followed faster."

A Great Big Boom
FOR The Great Big "U"

The past two weeks have been marked with sensational successes for the Universal and its friends. Our complete and sweeping triumph in the "101-Bison" matter was only a starter. Since then, according to reports from exchanges, there has been a terrific demand for that Universal program from exhibitors who never paid any attention to it before. Here are some interesting news items:

1. We have moved our offices in New York from 1 Union Square to the entire third floor of the Mecca Building, gaining better facilities than ever for handling the mass of executive and clerical work.

2. We are now receiving from 15,000 to 20,000 feet of excellent negative film from our Western outfits every week. This is a record! It permits us to pick and choose only the cream of the best for release!

3. Starting the week of Nov. 20th we are going to release some powerfully good Powers "kid" pictures made in the West. See that you get these by all means.

4. We have just received some master films from the Ambrosio Company which will prove intensely interesting to the American public. Only Universal exhibitors can show them!

5. The quality of all films on the Universal program will take a quicker upward leap during the next thirty days than ever before. If you have not seen any Universal films lately, make it a point to do so at once. You'll be amazed! You will immediately see why you ought to—

"THE TRIBAL LAW"—Two-Reel Western Feature.
Saturday, November 16th.

A novelty. A sensation. Something entirely new. An entirely different sort of Indian-Western picture. Wonderful scenic effects. Powerful situations and gripping climax.

Peeps Into The Future

A BRAND NEW BRAND ADDED TO THE PROGRAM and every release is going to be a sure-fire hit. Watch for release date.

"THE DEBT"—Rex Release, Nov. 21st. A genuine feature. (Two Reels.)

"THE HALF-BREED"—Bison Release, Nov. 23rd. A sizzingly Western thriller.

"VENGEANCE"—Two-Reel Imp. Released Nov. 28th. A sublime offering for Thanksgiving Day.

IMP

"WHEN CUPID RUNS WILD."
Monday, November 11th.

Florence thought it was a good joke to separate the countr boy and his sweetheart. Her little scheme acted as a boom erang and she actually had to propose to the country boy t save herself from an embarrassing situation. Many extremel funny situations and not a few dramatic touches. A ver pleasing serio-comedy.

"OFFICER 174."
Thursday, November 14th.

A King Baggot winner. A spirited drama of the adventurou life of a New York policeman. A big story capably handle and well produced.

"OLE, THE HYPNOTIST" and
"JUST LIKE THE WEST."
Saturday, November 16th.

They may look gloomy, they may feel blue when they com in, but after you've shown these two comedies they ar going home satisfied with a smile from ear to ear. A rea good split comedy

CHAMPION

"A PROTEGE OF UNCLE SAM"—Two-Reel Feature
Monday, November 11th.

The greatest drama ever weaved around the United State Navy. Glimpses of New York's underworld and the pa the hero played in it; interesting views of the life he le on Uncle Sam's fighting ships. The gripping scene in th boiler room is immense. A positive money-maker.

GEM

"THE LIGHTING OF LOVE'S WAY."
Tuesday, November 12th.

The half-witted hunchback loved the lighthouse tender daughter and he thought she loved him too. One of th many thrilling scenes takes place in the lighthouse whe the girl throws him from the lamphouse window.

AMBROSIO

"THE SIREN'S CALL TO DUTY."
Wednesday, November 13th.

From the time the big strike scene appears upon the scre until the little child pulls the factory whistle, and innocent ends the strike, it bristles with entertaining situations.

POWERS

"A COWBOY'S LEAP YEAR."
Wednesday, November 13th.

utchie's fear of the widow and his subsequent haste to arry her form the basis of a very funny Western. All the ow punchers fought shy of her until she inherited the money nd then they all made a scramble; but Dutchie had beat em to it.

"HIS CAREER."
Friday, November 15th.

linded by his political ambition and his mad desire to acuire new glory and fame he would have deserted his inalid wife had his lawyer not advised him that it was his ife's wealth that had made his success possible. An exeptionally fine drama.

VICTOR

"THE LADY LEONE"—Two-Reel Feature.
Friday, November 15th.

his is a Florence Lawrence house-packer if there ever was ne. It is so good that they will go home and bring the eighbors. You'll have to run an extra show to take care of ie crowds. It's a brilliant royalty drama with plenty of ction, beautiful costuming and staging and very superior cting.

CRYSTAL

"THE CHORUS GIRL" and "HER OLD LOVE."
Sunday, November 17th.

oo feet of smile-provoking laugh-getting comedy and a umorous mother-in-law farce that bubbles over with jollity.

MILANO

"THE BEWITCHED BANDBOX" and
"KELLY ON A TIGHTROPE"
Saturday, November 16th.

[a Ha! These comedies are so funny that we don't want to oil the fun by telling you about them. Don't fail to book em. They'll make a hit.

ECLAIR

"FOR THE HONOR OF THE FIRM."
Tuesday, November 12th.

Though the obstacles he had to overcome were innumerable the discharged employee surmounted them all and saved the name of the firm.

"THEIR CHILDREN'S APPROVAL."
Thursday, November 14th.

At first they objected to their parents marrying a second time, but when the girl found that it was her sweetheart's father that the widow wanted to marry and vice versa it all ended happily.

"A CRIMINAL IN SPITE OF HIMSELF" and "OPORTO AND ITS HARBOR."
Sunday, November 17th.

A woman's vengeance, similarity of names of a gentleman and a criminal form the groundwork for a pleasing dramatic offering. On the same reel interesting views of the making of the world famed Port wine.

REX

"CAMPING OUT."
Thursday, November 14th.

Get ready for a good hearty laugh. Forty scenes with a great big laugh in every one of them.

"A MOTHER'S AWAKENING."
Sunday, November 17th.

There isn't a mother, father or child who won't go into ecstacies over this true-to-life dramatic offering. The theme is perfectly sublime, the acting par excellence and the settings gorgeous.

Peeps Into The Future

Soon to be Released—"The Rights of the Savage"—1,000-foot Bison. Contains the kind of Western atmosphere that made a trust release ("A Cowboy Millionaire") famous. Big Western street on a festive day; broncho busting, bull dogging steers, and other stirring features of Western life are extremely well visualized. Don't miss a single one of these "101"-Bison releases.

"IDYLL OF HAWAII"

A romance, which found its inception in the circle of the elite of a metropolitan city in the East, finds its culmination in the Hawaiian Islands. In the execution of a carefully laid plot, the Princess of Hawaii bravely sacrifices her young life in order that the white planter whom she loved to distraction might be saved and marry the sweetheart of his own race. Beautiful settings, good dramatic action and excellent photographic quality.

FACTS
Not Released Heretofore

Listed below is a program of four regular releases—two comedies and two dramas—the output for two weeks. The comedies are lively and snappy and the dramas are impressive and forceful. The quality is of uniform excellence. These productions as well as the productions of preceding weeks bear the stamp of the new studio and its wonderful facilities.

A Comedy of Errors

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 20

A jealous husband is a comical spectacle particularly when his wife is above suspicion and when she has a sense of humor. His wife is in a compromising situation and she complicates matters herself with a fabric of fibs until her husband is almost frantic. Billy Quirk and Darwin Karr are the chief fun-makers.

The Power of Money

RELEASED FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 22

This story is of love, jealousy and finance. Scenes showing the operations of curb-brokers are enough to make this a feature. A broker is ruined by a rival and "bread cast upon the waters" returns in a full grown loaf.

The Paralytic

RELEASED WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 27

A wonderful exhibition in pantomime. Shows the mental agony of a paralyzed man in the presence of men he knows to have wronged his loved ones but he is powerless to accuse the guilty.

The Jenkins-Perkins War

RELEASED FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 29

The political differences between old Hiram Jenkins and Si Perkins, one a Bull Mooser, and the other a Wilsonite, starts a feud between the families and separates Billy from Sallie—but "love" finds a unique way and the Jenkins and Perkins war is declared off.

KINGS of the FOREST

The Most Exciting Motion Picture Ever Produced

This is the opinion of all critics and writers who have witnessed an exhibition of Selig's latest and greatest wild animal masterpiece, "Kings of the Forest." This is the film that has startled all picture-dom. Absolutely the most all-enthralling, vivid and fascinating drama of its kind that has ever been enacted before the camera. See the wild animals stalking a baby girl in the heart of the jungles. See the ferocious beasts wreak havoc in the covered wagon and carry away a live calf. Two reels of similar sensational incidents. Clever action and wonderful story. Two reels of total of 1800 feet.

DON'T FAIL TO BOOK THIS SENSATION OF THE FILM WORLD

Special Release for November 11th

SELIG'S INVINCIBLE "FIVE-A-WEEK"

Nov. 18th

A MAN AMONG MEN

The true story of a wealthy automobile manufacturer who suddenly turned philanthropic. A story such as is witnessed in everyday life. Miss Adrienne Kroell and Mr. Carl Winterhoff play the principal roles. About 1,000 feet.

Nov. 19th

The Saint and the Siwash

A thrilling and soulful story of life in the great Northwest. Showing that sometimes even white women can take lessons from their Indian sisters. Full of action and atmosphere. About 1,000 feet.

AT THE RAINBOW'S END

John Lee, son of a country grocer, is married to a nagging slattern. Elane is also married, and to a man she loathes. In early years they had spent a day of Arcadian love which can never be forgotten. Again they meet. Elane being a widow and John unhappy, they resolve to unite and flee to a distant land. They are, however, awakened to the obligations of circumstances and realize that they are chasing a Rainbow.

Released Thursday Nov. 14, 1912. Length 1040 ft.

The Country School Teacher

Molly Mason, a beautiful, but wild, self-willed girl, has conquered all restraint until she meets Neil Freeman, the new teacher of the school. He is a man of large frame and strength and can subdue the boys by physical force. With Molly he uses gentle firmness, but the girl laughs at him. One day in anger her brother strikes the teacher. Then fright and pity develops her womanhood and she falls in love with her master.

Released Friday, Nov. 15, 1912

Length 687 feet

SUITORS AND SUIT CASES

Sam and May love each other, but Dad wants May to marry Jones and he arranges an outing, at which he hopes to bring Jones and his angel child together. Reggie, a mutual friend in the party, however, in the bustle at the depot exchanges suit cases with May. He then dresses up in May's clothes and creates a lot of fun, which eventually brings the true lovers together.

Length 365 feet

THE SLATE INDUSTRY

An interesting industrial picture showing the evolution of the school slate. First, the quarrying, splitting and cutting; later in the factory, where the slates are polished, trimmed, framed, bound and laced. The scenes are taken at one of the largest factories in America.

Released Saturday, Nov. 16, 1912. Length 1054 ft.

CHIEF WHITE EAGLE

White Eagle by the death of his father is appointed Chief of the tribe. He has been at school in the East and on his arrival at the reservation, a white woman flirts with him and induces him to love her. He proposes marriage and the woman turns on him so viciously that he strangles her. The Commander of the Fort orders White Eagle to be shot, which he is; and the tribe kneel around the dead body of their Chief and pray to Manitou, the Great Spirit.

Released Monday, Nov. 18, 1912. Length 1054 ft.

THE GOOD FOR NOTHING

Dick Evans, a farmer's son, who has discovered that he is a failure in the big city, goes back home and buys out the local newspaper, "The Citizen." He had been looked upon as a "good for nothing" and the postmaster refuses to let him have his daughter. Dick, as an editor, is a cyclone, his paper suggests a new postmaster and the editor runs for Mayor against his own father. Finally he is admitted to be "good for everything" and the greatest power in the town.

THE EDISON KINETOSCOPE

UNDERWRITERS' TYPE "B"

The final test of a motion picture machine lies in its ability to project steady, clear-cut pictures while it is subjected to ceaseless grinding. To do that it must be built simply and only the best materials can be used. The Edison, the pioneer moving picture machine, is built to last. Countless experiments have shown just what materials are best suited for each part and each part is thoroughly tested before it is placed in the machine. Hardened steel is used in the Edison where there is the greatest strain. Everywhere there is the greatest possible care taken to prevent wear. Buy an Edison and let that "One Moment Please" sign gather dust on your shelf.

The exceptionally high grade lens used on the Edison gives the clear, sharp picture that your audience has a right to demand. The well-balanced mechanism gives freedom from flickers.

Get an Edison, save repair bills and hold your patrons.

Facts and Comments

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD is much gratified to think that its stand on the cigarette coupon offer has met with such hearty response from individual and organized exhibitors. The Columbus Local No. 4 has passed a resolution endorsing our attitude toward the coupon offer, and goes on record as opposed to all premiums and prizes. The Cleveland Local No. 1 praises THE WORLD editorial on the subject of the coupon offer and declares its emphatic protest against the idea of using the motion picture theaters for the distribution of cigarettes. We received a number of letters from exhibitors taking a decided stand against the premium proposition long before our editorial went to press, showing that the moving picture men are alert and thoroughly alive to their own interests. There is every reason to believe that the scheme of the tobacco company to stimulate the sale of cigarettes with the aid of the motion picture will not succeed.

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD receives so many words of praise and compliment for the stars, the lesser as well as the greater, of the silent stage, that we could fill column after column with words of appreciation. While this is of course impossible, we cannot help conveying this message of enjoyment and admiration from patrons to the thespians of the silent stage in general. Their tasks are often hard and arduous, and the reward for the exercise of their gifts must sometimes seem meagre. There must be a deep sort of satisfaction in knowing that your audience is the world and that the applause travels with the sun and is ever present. The very fact that thousands of motion picture patrons think it worth their while to sit down and write earnest and often long letters of appreciation to this paper is proof enough of the valuable work done by the actors and actresses who show their art before the camera. There is a bond of friendship between patrons of the electric theater and certain actors and companies that is just as strong and never quite as foolish as the "hero-worship" that follows the stars of the speaking stage.

THE law of the State of Massachusetts allows the exhibition of motion pictures on Sunday under numerous conditions and restrictions. No picture can be shown on Sunday unless it receives the special approbation of the State authorities. In addition to this there must be a formal licensing by the local officials. Similar laws prevail in other parts of New England. On the whole such an arrangement, while far from being just, is better than an absolute prohibition on Sundays. It gives the exhibitors a chance to assert their influence and to sway public sentiment. As the final consent for a Sunday exhibition depends on the local authorities, it is not likely that mayors will antagonize a healthy and general demand for Sunday exhibitions in their cities by withholding their approval. Wherever the exhibitors exert themselves in promoting a favorable public opinion the Sunday exhibition is a moral certainty. We are pleased to note that exhibitors are doing this with energy and good sense, using the weapons and arguments provided for them in many relevant articles printed in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD.

We mention a recent instance of an anti-Sunday crusade in the city of Fitchburg, Mass., because the case is typical and may afford a lesson to exhibitors in other parts of the country when they are confronted with a similar situation. In Fitchburg the mayor, though personally in favor of Sunday exhibitions, has announced his intention of refusing further Sunday permits because of a protest of the ministers of the city. It is to be noted that no chance was given to the friends of the decent Sunday exhibition to be heard before the mayor, and we are glad to say that now one of the leading exhibitors has taken up the fight and seems in a fair way of gaining at least a rehearing of the subject before the mayor. It remains now to stir up friends of the motion picture who are not financially interested in the Sunday exhibition There is not a community in the land without its true and disinterested friends of the picture. Let the exhibitors approach them and make them active in the cause of a clean and proper Sunday exhibition of moving pictures. We know that in many towns and cities the best men and women in all walks of life are the earnest friends of the motion picture, and need very little urging to voice their convictions in places where it will do the most good. We have looked through the reports of the Fitchburg papers in search of the reasons given by the ministers to sustain their objections against the Sunday exhibition. We have been unable to find anything more definite than the opinion of the ministers, "that the pictures were not for the best interests of the community." We have a right to ask these clergymen for a "bill of particulars." Unless they specify their objections it is impossible to reply to them. We live in too enlightened an age to regard the arbitrary and dogmatic utterance of ministers as final and conclusive in any large question which affects the moral welfare of a very large portion of the community.

ONE of the most pleasing signs in the conditions of the industry today is the continued and deeper interest of the general public in the making and exhibiting of motion pictures. What was formerly but a passing curiosity has today developed into an intelligent and permanent interest. The change has been slow and gradual but sure and universal. There is every reason to believe that this sympathetic interest will be of immense benefit to the industry. There is no form of amusement today, which has on the whole a higher morale than the motion picture and a keen and general interest in motion pictures will build up the most desirable and enduring kind of popularity. It will also act as a safeguard against a deterioration in quality.

A FRIEND and reader sends us a clipping from a newspaper, in which a steady patron of the electric theater speaks interestingly of what he calls the "moving picture face." Watching the audience at a motion picture entertainment is a great study in psychology. Our friend says that he recently saw "a clown picture," and looking at his neighbor observed "how his face was moving in response to every contortion in the face of the actor." In a tragic play he noticed some "much-affected young woman swaying hither and yon, obeying every movement of the sorrowing heroine."

Critic, Producer and Exhibitor

By W. Stephen Bush

IN telling the plain truth about the merits and demerits of film productions the moving picture journals fulfill a most important duty and render a great service to the entire industry. The exhibitor has a right to look to the critic for advice and information concerning the releases of the present and the future. Unlike his European brother, the American exhibitor has, generally speaking, no opportunity to get advance views of the reels which he is expected to rent. It is quite true that he receives from the manufacturer of films much literary matter dealing with the reels which are offered to him either for purchase or rental. It is natural and reasonable for the manufacturer to have an exalted opinion of his own work. Without confidence in himself he probably would never produce anything worth while. It is easy to see, however, that the manufacturer cannot be expected to be a fair and impartial judge of his own pictures. No man can sit in judgment on his own case. It is safe to presume that he is more or less prejudiced in favor of himself. He is an interested party anxious to dispose of his output at a profit. To neutralize the exaggerated optimism of the producer it is well for the prudent exhibitor to keep on hand a large supply of grains of salt. These valuable grains of salt are the products of the Laboratory of Honest Criticism, and are furnished freely by The Moving Picture World.

It is not claimed that the critic is infallible; on the contrary, it is most emphatically admitted that he is not. Nothing more can be asked of the critic than that he be honest and competent. Possessing these two qualifications he cannot help being useful to the manufacturer no less than to the exhibitor. The reviewer is much closer to the public than the manufacturer. He is in constant touch with the best friends of the motion picture and knows pretty well what the enemies of the picture are thinking and doing. He hears the comments and opinions of others, and this prevents him from becoming narrow, one-sided or dogmatic. He has special facilities for gauging the public taste and divining changes in public sentiment. He has no axe to grind and no special interests to serve. He can take a broad view of things, and need not squint in any particular direction. In other words, he writes chiefly for the benefit of the exhibitor. He tries to see the pictures as the best and most intelligent portion of the public will probably view them. He must have a high standard. He is not without sympathetic knowledge of the difficulties which beset the manufacturer, and he is always willing to make a judicious allowance therefor. Whenever he looks at a picture he realizes that it has taken time and money and labor and patience to produce it. His chief function, therefore, is not the destroying but the correcting and improving of things. It is easy to pour forth the vials of sarcasm on the inexperienced or ill-advised producer, or to indulge the vein of satire at his expense. There is, however, no promise of construction in such work. The honest and enlightened critic will turn the destructive edge of his pen only against such men as would wilfully and deliberately degrade and debase the picture and cater to the baser and lower instincts of human nature.

The producer who aims at clean pictures and strives after perfection in art and who sets store by the educational value of the picture; the manufacturer who engages in big productions and loves to handle big subjects, will claim no exemption from criticism, but will rather invite and welcome it. Criticism is really nothing more than co-operation in disguise.

There is little doubt that the exhibitor appreciates and profits by the candid and impartial reviews of the critic. If the absolute right of selection is denied to him he still has the power to avoid what is weak or inferior or objectionable. If a new production of superior merit makes its appearance on the market the exhibitor likes to have the praise of the manufacturer corroborated by praise from disinterested and thoroughly reliable sources. True criticism is to the exhibitor what the lights on the sea are to the navigator.

Criticism in the higher sense of the word does not mean merely the reviewing of certain pictures. To attain its highest usefulness criticism must point out ethical errors and shortcomings and warn against mistakes that affect not only a particular film but apply to certain kinds and classes of pictures. To make my meaning clearer, I will mention two instances in point: The making of sectarian pictures was a grave injury to exhibitors. At one time there seemed to be a veritable deluge of these pictures, rousing public indignation and resentment and doing good to nobody. The Moving Picture World, in the interest of the industry, and especially for the benefit of the exhibitor, declared war against productions of this type, and we are glad to say that there has been an end of them. There is another error into which, in recent times, even some of the clever and reputable manufacturers have fallen. I am speaking of the attempts of the producers of one nationality to portray either the social life or the history of another nationality. Purely and distinctively English or American subjects should not as a rule be taken up and filmed by French or Italian producers, and vice versa. There are but few exceptions to this rule. I imagine that no European manufacturers could, for instance, do justice to a Life of Washington, and but very few American producers have the facilities and equipments for the making of a great historic picture taken from the annals of Europe. I am always reminded of a famous French translation whenever I dwell on this subject. When the "weird sisters" stop Macbeth with most prophetic greeting "on the blasted heath" they address him with this solemn greeting: "Hail, Macbeth." A Frenchman calmly translated it with, "Bon jour, Monsieur Macbeth," which in plain American means about the same as "How are you, Mac?"

AN old and observant motion picture man who recently returned with his company from the European continent had gathered some interesting facts about the methods of censorship which are in vogue there. The police in France, Germany, Italy, Austria and Russia are lenient to the point of laxity in all matters relating to morals. Plainly unclean and vulgar pictures are freely permitted, "pictures," as our informant says, "which no self-respecting American manufacturer would want to put on the market even if there were no Board of Censorship." On the other hand, any pictures that in the judgment of the government seem to weaken the respect of the public "for duly constituted authority" are tabooed. Excepting France, the policeman is a sacrosanct person in Continental Europe, and our free and easy way of joking at the expense of constables and sheriffs is not well received by autocratic governments.

Two Delightful Ones Released by Edison.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

STRAIGHTFORWARD enjoyment and a deep sense of relief is to be found in "The Third Thanksgiving" and "A Christmas Accident" of the immediate Edison program, especially after such a gloomy time as we have been having with ghastly murders and other dark deeds of the blood-soaked description. Some of the exchange men seem to be under the impression that the entire production of moving pictures should be consecrated to crime, but the daily papers put most of us in as close contact as we care to be with assassins, and we prefer to let the majesty of the law deal with them rather than our little places of entertainment.

I welcome with outstretched hand any idealism in moving pictures when it is woven into the very fabric of our daily lives. Any inspiring photoplay that warms the natural tenderness within us, that makes intelligible the necessity of our living close to the best that is within us and around us—for growth in this new art is conditioned on its fidelity to our advancing ideals—must rise to our social relations and the progressive spirit of our enterprises to take the high place it deserves.

Scene from "The Third Thanksgiving" (Edison).

"The Third Thanksgiving" and "A Christmas Accident," are both plays that will reach out to all classes without exception of age or circumstance, and both drive straight at the narrow-mindedness of a type still in our midst, the selfish old man who has accumulated a little pile of his own. We all know the old fellow who folds his scanty cloak of superiority about him—"I've got mine"—and hands out advice or philosophic precepts because they are cheap.

In the first-named play he is a New England farmer, who is about to sit down with his wife to a Thanksgiving dinner when the only son arrives with his fiancée, a young actress. The young people receive a cold greeting on account of the old man's prejudices and take their leave instead of sitting down to the table. They return to the city, marry and live the simple life—a Harlem flat. They actually thrive on bread, cheese and kisses, even after a baby comes, but they are unable to effect a reconciliation with the old couple and the second Thanksgiving is shown in a pretty double exposure, the old ones at home, the young ones in a city restaurant.

Before the third celebration of divine goodness, the most distinctive of New England holidays, the young man is taken ill, loses his situation and is threatened with extreme poverty. His loyal little wife seeks employment at a moving picture company, and her professional experience, together with the fact that she has a dancing friend at the work, gives her opportunity. She takes up her burden with courage, supports her sick husband and baby, and keeps her small household in order besides.

The old farmer is taken one night to a picture show and there sees on the screen an Edison release exhibiting the young man's wife in abbreviated costume. It is now high time for him to assert his moral superiority. He accordingly takes his wife to town, and they visit the poor home of their boy. The old man opens up in denunciation of the ungodly wife, but is not permitted to go very far by the young husband. He strikes back with more soul than strength, reveals that the little creature has pulled him through the hardest and most perilous period of his mature life and leads his parents to the kitchen where she is bearing her heavy burdens with cheerful courage.

Knowledge of the wrong he has done to the young wife cuts the old man to the quick, and the sudden revulsion of feeling he shows is the affecting moment of the play. The art that reflects temperament, intellect, emotions and character in this simple way is not to die if its evolution proceeds along such natural and simple lines. A reconciliation is effected after a lot of beautiful and sincere work on the part of the characters, and the "Third Thanksgiving, as may well be expected, is the happiest one in the lives of all."

A Christmas Accident.

The old man in "A Christmas Accident" is another of the same kind, though he lives in the city. He and his wife live alone in security so far as money is concerned, but he is annoyed by the enforced contact with a young neighbor who has a wife and four small children. The crabbed old money-maker has reached the height he wished to attain, but he has grown sour in his isolation—he has climbed above the companionship of his fellowbeings, above the natural and sympathetic interest all normal men feel in bright children. They bother him at the front door and distress him in the back yard, where they play with his dog. When some one poisons his pet he accuses the children of doing it to spite him, and his rage grows to sullen hatred.

He has what the young man lacks, but the young man has what makes the world go round more than money ever did, the love of a true woman and the affection of devoted children. The sun shines merrily for those who love, while the self-enforced isolation and exclusiveness of the old man who has detached himself from God's own creatures brings him only a deeper sense of loneliness. When time comes to celebrate the festival of the birth of Christ, the old man orders a turkey of the butcher, but the young one gives his small savings entirely over to brightening the lives of his children.

The turkey is carried home by the old man in a snow storm, and, while blinded by the wind and snow, he walks into the wrong house, though it might be the right house for turkey appetites. He finds that the children of his neighbor have caught their papa and mama with the goods, caught them dressing the Christmas tree. They have made the best of the situation by telling a story about Santa Claus, when the old, white-haired money grub comes in with his turkey. He is mistaken for Santa Claus and compelled to deliver what was intended for his own consumption. In recompense, when his real identity is made clear, one of the little girls gives him her teddy bear to replace the pet dog he lost.

The old man's mental readjustment is gradual—it is difficult for him to give up anything—but his forlorn wife comes in and is so warmed by the charming scene that she helps break down his egotism, and general happiness results.

HECTOR DION LEAVES RELIANCE.

Hector Dion, for some time leading man of the Reliance company of players, has resigned and is now at liberty to engage with any reliable company. He has had a long and successful career as a motion picture player dating back to the early days of the Vitagraph Company for which concern he was the first leading man.

"From the Submerged" (Essanay)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

PRODUCER THEODORE K. WHARTON and one of Essanay's Eastern companies have given us a well staged and well enacted photodrama in "From the Submerged," which will be released November 12th. The story has a strong heart appeal, not from the sentimental angle only, but from the sympathetic as well. It brings us in touch with people in the "bread line," and with pampered society folks who have never known the pinch of want. It shows us that poverty begets sympathy and that wealth has the tendency to breed selfishness and apathy, when those who possess it fail to keep in touch with their less fortunate fellow creatures.

F. H. Calvert appears as the man who was "down in his luck," and who afterwards falls heir to an ample fortune. He shows his versatility by being equally at home in the part of the hungry, forlorn wanderer as in the role of the favored society man. Misses Ruth Stonehouse and Dolores Cassinelli give strong portraitures of the poor girl and the rich girl, respectively.

There are several fine scenes in this photoplay, notably those showing the "bread line," the fashionable reception party and the slums of Chinatown. The settings are artistic and the photography excellent.

John Wingfield, the only son of a rich father, is disowned because of his extravagance and dissolute life. He goes out West and attempts to begin life anew. He finds, however, that he has no knowledge that will enable him to earn a livelihood, and is obliged to work as an unskilled laborer, when chance offers him even that.

Things have gone hard with him, as the opening scene shows us, for he is seen rising from a bench in a park, where he has spent the night. Thoroughly discouraged and hopeless, he walks with difficulty to a bridge nearby, and is climbing the framework to plunge into the river, when a poorly clad girl seizes him and prevails on him to forego the suicidal act. She shows him that life is for her also a hard struggle, and he reads in her face the lines showing the mastery of self and determination to do her full duty against all odds.

A sense of shame seizes him, and he clasps her hand in farewell as he thanks her for her intervention.

Spent with hunger, Wingfield smothers his pride and makes his way to the bread line in the city, where others are waiting to be served. He sinks on a bench, being too weak to stand, and a man in the crowd rushes to his side and gives him the cup of coffee and the bread which had just been received. While eating, Wingfield picks up a newspaper and reads the following advertisement: "John Wingfield is requested to return home at once as his father is dying. All will be forgiven."

The following scene shows the home-coming and the reconciliation at his father's bedside. He had arrived just in time, for his father died a few minutes afterwards. And now we see Wingfield installed in a magnificent mansion, with a great fortune at his disposal and flattered by the men and women of his set. An ambitious mother sees in Wingfield a most acceptable husband for her daughter, and the latter takes pains to make herself attractive to him. Wingfield is impressed by the beauty and cleverness of the rich girl and evidently believes that she will prove a fitting mate. But fate destines otherwise.

One evening a slumming party is formed from Wingfield's fashionable set, and his prospective wife is one of the party. The miseries of Chinatown and other places are viewed during the trip. As the party passes a "bread line" in a squalid neighborhood, John draws the attention of his fiancee to the hungry throng. She laughs indifferently at the spectacle and thinks it very funny. John is shocked at her heartlessness. He goes among the men and gives to each a sum of money, while the others of his party pass on. The incident, he feels, has created an insurmountable barrier between the rich girl and himself, and he rejoices that her true self had been revealed to him in time.

Seated in his home, his mind goes back to the poor girl, who had saved him from himself. The fearful scene comes back to him vividly. As he resolves to find her, he tears the photograph of his fiancee in pieces.

Next day the search was begun. Arriving in the Western city he visited the park where he had met the girl who had been his savior. For days following, he frequented the walks and drives, scanning eagerly the many faces, with the hope of finding her, but was obliged to return to his hotel each day disappointed. One evening, when he was about to give up the search, fate brought the poor girl back to him. He was seated near the river, into which he was about to plunge to his death when her hand had withheld him. His attention was drawn to a forlorn woman, who walked determinedly towards the water. He could feel that she meant self destruction and he rushed to prevent her. Then he found himself face to face with the object of his search.

Before revealing the change in his fortunes, he asked her to be his wife. Joyfully they sought a pastor to perform the ceremony. Not until she arrived at his palatial home did the poor girl learn that her husband was a millionaire.

"Billy's Burglar."

Two-Reel Vitagraph Comedy of Boyhood.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS is a bright and attractive glimpse of what goes on in the mind of a boy, together with a pictured account of his thrilling adventure with a noted burglar. He is a well-fed and interesting kid—not one of the fretful kind—and his bland self-confidence in a trying situation is a delightful piece of characterization. His natural love of the story, the same that takes him to the moving picture shows, is one that is bound to be utilized in due time to lead him into the heart of history and literature in general, but it impels him in this case to read sensational detective stories of the Nick Carter type.

The fascinating mystery of these tales so absorbs the time and attention of Billy that he reads them while he is brushing his hair or washing his face, always with results negligent that do not contribute to his personal appearance, and he tells them over again to the older members of the family in a way that gets on the nerves of his father and mother, but the natural tendencies of his mind, together with those instincts of the chase that are revealed to be in the blood of every fighting little human male, carry him through an experience requiring pluck and intelligence to solve and cause those who ridiculed him to sit up and think it over.

The author of this comedy is Miss Mignon Ziegfeld; the direction of the production is credited to Mr. Van Dyke Brooke.

Casey, the convivial policeman, brings notice to Mr. Mack that several robberies have been committed in his neighborhood by a clever second-story man known as "One-Eyed Jim," whose specialty is that of disguising himself as a bicycle cop. When this notice is returned to Casey in the kitchen, he is so engrossed in cajoling Molly that he drops the notice on the floor. There it is subsequently found by Billy. The boy is at once fired with an ambition to capture the noted crook, and confides this to Molly. Her mind becomes so upset by the terrors Billy depicts that she packs up her things and escapes from the house in a hurry.

When Casey revisits the house to wet his whistle with some of Mr. Mack's whiskey he finds Mrs. Mack at work and mistakes her for a good-looking new cook. Mrs. Mack mistakes him for the burglar who enters houses disguised as a policeman, and a scene of terror for her and of unrestricted drinking for Casey follows. In order to save herself from the supposed burglar, Mrs. Mack encourages him to drink himself into a state of insensibility. Then from merciful impulse that seems somewhat strained she ties up his head in a towel.

The real burglar, meanwhile, gets busy. He climbs the porch with agility and skill so significant that one might think he had been in that particular line of business before becoming a villain in moving pictures. He is seen looting one room after another, while the policeman is getting a solid package in the kitchen and trying to kiss Mrs. Mack. Her screams draw the attention of the pseudo policeman, and he goes to the kitchen to protect her from the real one.

One-Eyed Jim takes charge of the drunken intruder and goes through his clothes for what is supposed to be stolen property, appropriating the drunken cop's money, watch and revolver. While this is going on—it is an amusing piece of comedy—Billy and his dad return home and find the upper house in disorder. Further search for Mrs. Mack reveals that the noted burglar has been at his old tricks. When they enter the kitchen they find the burglar in charge of the situation and the real policeman befogged with liquor. It is time for One-Eyed Jim to make his getaway, but bright little Billy recognizes Casey as a local officer, and a casual inspection of the disguised burglar reveals to the embryonic detective that the supposed bicycle cop has only one good eye.

Billy sneaks up stairs to get at the telephone, but is compelled to hide behind a curtain when One-Eyed Jim follows closely. The burglar has come up for his loot, but his suspicions are aroused by Billy's movements, and he drags the boy from his place of concealment. He gags and binds the kid in the same thorough manner that he climbed the porch and manages to escape out of the window. He is making for the automobile he uses in such depredations when he notes two officers on the ground discussing Casey's singular absence from his accustomed beat. This holds the thief in his hiding place for a while.

Billy now does the best business in the comedy. He has not read the detective stories for nothing. He manages to remove a sabre from its place as a wall ornament and places it between his legs in such a manner that he cuts the cords that bind his wrists and the rest is easy. He takes a pistol from the sideboard drawer and goes in pursuit of Gloomy Jim of the Injured Optic.

He is just in time to catch the auto while the burglar is cranking it up. The plucky kid hides under the hood and crawls over the latter while the machine is in motion and compels the burglar to turn in his auto tracks and forces him to stop when they come upon a policeman who is actually attending to his duty. The cop jumps in, and the noted burglar personally conducts himself back to his undoing.

The plight of Mr. and Mrs. Mack when they find that their supposed captive is an officer of the law is relieved by the disclosure that their bright boy has caught the real criminal with the goods, and Billy becomes the hero of the day.

As a comedy of boyhood the play is clean and wholesome. We can stand more of the same kind if they give us an insight into impulses moving the American of tomorrow, the active, intelligent and interesting boy of to-day.

"Convicted by Hypnotism"

Union Features.

By G. F. Blaisdell.

IT is always a pleasure to see on the screen the work of Miss Lucille Guyon. In the latest feature production of the Paris Eclair studio this superb—one is tempted to say peerless—actress of the photoplay has unusual opportunity to display her marvelous versatility. In the portrayal of the hypnotized subject of the unscrupulous physician husband her absolute control of facial muscles transforms the expressive countenance to a condition of immobility. Throughout the two reels there is a constant shifting from the state of hypnotic irresponsibility to that of normal vivacious womanhood. The transition of the features from extreme fluidity to the blank stare denoting the plasticity of the subject to the will of her mental master will hold the deep interest of the beholder.

Miss Guyon is given the best of support. The role of the husband is taken by M. Krause, who does well in an extremely difficult part. Other notable characterizations are those of the father of the heroine and of the physician, Dr. Harrison, the mutual friend of all. The settings indicate much forethought and display good taste. The photography is in keeping with the other chief factors of the production. One of the outdoor scenes that will attract attention is that of the garden party which Dr. Harrison has arranged in order that the criminal husband may be undone before many witnesses. As the guests arrive they see in the foreground what appear to be a number of Japanese sunshades. Suddenly the parasols rise from the ground, revealing a maiden under each. The girls form a circle into the center of which steps an Oriental dancer, who entertains the party.

Dr. Harrison introduces Dr. Lanning to Blanche Raymond. The acquaintance ripens into love. Dr. Lanning goes to Mr. Raymond and asks for the hand of his daughter. In a charming scene Mr. Raymond sends for Blanche and the parental sanction is given. Shortly after the wedding, Mrs. Lanning, while entertaining at a lawn party several of her women friends, suffers a nervous attack. Her husband, in treating her, discovers that he has hypnotic influence over his wife. He makes use of this power very shortly in order to steal away to his club. In subsequent visits he gambles heavily and is ruined financially. Impelled at first to end all by means of a pistol, he changes his mind and decides to make use of his strange control over his wife. After hypnotizing her he orders her to proceed to the home of her father, get the key of the safe from under the paternal pillow, and bring to him at home all of the contents of the receptacle. Mrs. Lanning implicitly follows instructions. As she closes the safe door her father, aroused by the noise, takes a pistol and starts to investigate. He is horrified to discover his own daughter robbing him. As he expostulates with her she shows no sign of recognition. The father takes hold of the young woman to detain her, but she, with the strength of a hypnotized person, throws him to the floor and fractures his skull. Mrs. Lanning returns to her husband and delivers the valuable papers and notes she has taken from the safe.

In the morning Mrs. Lanning is informed of her father's death. Dr. Lanning, under pretense of attending a doctors' conference, steals away to Italy. Mrs. Lanning receives a letter from her husband. Joyously she opens it. As she reads it her face undergoes a change. The set, stern expression indicates the condition of self-hypnosis. Dr. Harrison is called in. He suspects that all is not as it should be. He questions his patient, and his fears are confirmed. He successfully brings Mrs. Lanning back to a normal state.

Dr. Harrison is convinced that the unworthy husband intends to leave his wife permanently. He brings matters to a climax by inviting Dr. and Mrs. Lanning to a party to be held on his lawn. Before the assembled guests, and with a detective in the background, Dr. Harrison puts Mrs. Lanning into a trance and questions her as to her actions on the fatal night. She freely tells him what took place. Dr. Harrison denounces the real murderer and brings the wife out of her trance. Seeing her husband in trouble she rushes to his side. Then she is told the story she has told the party. Dr. Lanning is overcome. His wife collapses. She is inconsolable. The detective takes the husband away. It is a strong story—strongly told.

"A PROTEGE OF UNCLE SAM" (Champion).

The Champion two-reel picture, "A Protege of Uncle Sam," is a far more valuable offering than may be at once apparent. Reflection will prove it and it will do a heap of good. The best thing that it shows is the navy's value to the United States simply and solely as a training school for men. It tells an optimistic, wholesome story of the regeneration of a rather wild youth, using the discipline and training that Jack Tar gets as the means. It is convincing, for it is true. The scenes were taken on board one of the big ships and show, somewhat idealized, yet fairly, what a sailor's life is. As showing this, it gives what is not only interesting but valuable information, especially since it suggests a good use for it. The picture will not only help the navy but it will help many boys who want to make something of themselves and can't, and may help many parents who don't know what to do with some unruly son who has much good in him but needs training. For its own good the national government should help this picture along. It tells a good and interesting story besides.

The picture was probably suggested by the visit of the big fleet to New York recently. It gives the history of a lad from childhood to the time when he has distinctly made good. He was adopted from an orphanage by rich people and grows up as their son. The parental discipline of his foster father wasn't quite enough to keep the lad straight. This is natural. A father has usually a key to his child's character in his own nature, but an adopted child is apt to be an unknown quantity until it is too late to guide him easily. We see it so in this boy's case. His foster father is unable to rein him in and he runs a pretty fast pace. There is a girl in the story, the daughter of the banker who is a warm friend of the foster father and who tries to train the lad to be a business man, but fails. The girl knows that there is much good in him and she remains his true friend, even after he has been discharged for drunkeness by his employer and cast adrift by his foster father in the hope that he will wake up and make a man of himself. There isn't much hope of it; he goes from bad to worse and his course downward is steady. It takes us through some very interesting slum scenes. He is now down and out and finds the upper part of the city "healthier" than the Chatham Square purlieus. We had seen a very lively fight in the latter place. The young man is shown leaning on a railing at Riverside Drive watching the armada of fighting ships. The girl, passing in an automobile, recognizes him, gets out and advises him to join the navy. This he does.

The second reel occupies itself mostly with his experience in the navy. It shows us ships and life on shipboard. Of course, this has been done before, but we have never seen it done in just this way and we do not think that any other picture of an American Jack Tar's life has had the human and the educational value that this has. Yet the story has not been spoiled for the sake of information; perhaps the shoe is on the other foot, but it is true enough and satisfying.

The Picture in the Pulpit.

By the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S. T. B.

THE Rev. Herbert A. Jump, who has not only done but also suffered in the cause of educational and religious moving pictures, delivered in the University of California, October 24, last, a most interesting lecture on the subject of the "Motion Picture as a Five Cent University." Mr. Jump is now the pastor of the First Congregational Church at Oakland, California. In the report before us, he claims that the picture theater is the "most democratic thing which we have in American life today except the polls, and that no student of social conditions can afford to be in ignorance either of its extent or its power for molding character." Then follow some interesting statistics and similes as to the size of the business and a discussion of the reasons why people like the pictures and why they are a great boon to the poor man, giving him a chance to have clean fun, just as the printing press gives him a chance to learn. We would like to qubte the whole report but must content ourselves with a couple of extracts that have particular bearing on the religious and moral aspects of the pictures. The first of these is as follows:

> "From pictures, we unconsciously derive notion of life and knowledge of the world which affects our whole point of view. Every time you see a film it makes a difference. A story is written on your brain, and the brain translates that story in some respect upon the soul. The scene of cruelty, vice or brutality makes it easier to believe that the world is cruel, vicious or brutal; whereas, on the other hand, scenes of tenderness or heroism or love have a positive effect in the same proportions."

This is not only good psychology but good theology too and it is an important point for all religious workers who use or advocate using the pictures to bear in mind. As Edison says, "seeing is believing, not because we were doubtful before but because seeing enables us to understand better." Every religious service is essentially a drama whether it be the simple morning and night prayer at the bedside or in time of trial or temptation or the most elaborate ritual service that can be performed; and consequently when we embody the picture in a religious act or service and make it a part of a drama in which the spectator himself is an interested actor we not only teach him more effectively the particular moral lesson conveyed by that film but we also give him a moral tonic that raises the whole tone of his spiritual being, a fact that is one of the strongest arguments we know of for the educational and religious picture. We would like to add, however, to Mr. Jump's proposition, that while in themselves deeds of wickedness make it easier to believe the world is evil and deeds of the good, the true or the beautiful have an equally positive effect in the opposite direction, it is also true that evil deeds presented in their real relation to good have the effect of repelling us from the bad, and urge us forward and upward. As he says further on in his lecture,

> "The evil effects of the motion picture has been grossly exaggerated. When any act of violence has been done by some youngster the first explanation by the police has been to the effect that the motion picture is to blame. As a matter of fact, we are no more justified in eliminating the motion picture because of these occasional unfortunate occurrences than we would be justified in giving up our public library because the story of adventure contained therein has occasionally moved nervous youngsters to unfortunate imitation thereof. The moral standards of the motion-picture films is quite as high as the moral standards of fiction and poetry which are put out by our public library."

We are inclined to go a little further than the lecturer and say that the moral standards of the picture are in not a few respects much cleaner and higher than a great deal of the poetry and fiction we get today, especially in some of the so-called first class magazines and novels. With pictures, with literature, with in fact all the things technically called "the pomps and vanities of this wicked world" the truth of the matter is that they are morally good if they are used in the right way and at the right time and that if they are used in the wrong way and at the wrong time they are morally bad. Christ Himself bids us "make to ourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness," that is, use, not abuse these things for human betterment; but Scripture is equally emphatic in telling us not to set our hearts upon them but to "set our affection on things above."

More Converts.

A letter from Mr. George H. Hackathorn of Pendleton, Oregon, tells us that the First Methodist Church of that place has begun experimenting with the picture by showing "a one reel picture of the Life of Christ with an appropriate entertainment in conjunction." As a result, he continues: "The Pastor was highly pleased as well as all those who witnessed the production." So much so, indeed, that other exhibitions have been planned and the officers of the church have determined to make the second occasion a greater success than the first. Mr. Hackathorn also says that the schools have become interested in the educational use of pictures through the judicious exploitation of the Milano "Odyssey" by the theater men and that the Orpheum theater in Pendleton is going to exhibit, at the request of the high school, Cines' "Conspiracy of Cataline." This is very good news indeed and we are especially delighted to learn of the cordial relations between the schools and the exhibitors. Both are certain to reap much benefit from the alliance and we hope soon to hear that equally cordial co-operation exists between the churches and the exhibitors. As the following will show, this co-operation is already working in Vincennes, Indiana.

Comment and Criticism.

The news comes to us in a recent letter from the Rev. Edgar Fay Daugherty, of Vincennes, Indiana, which is very interesting also as showing the results that can be accomplished in the religious field in a short time by intelligent and earnest effort. Last Sunday was known in most of the Protestant churches as "Tuberculosis Sunday" and Mr. Daugherty wrote us about a week before that he intended to us slides in connection with his sermon. We suggested his using either Edison's "Curable Disease" or Selig's "On the Trail of the Germ" as well. Mr. Daugherty says:

> "I am indebted to you in decided measure for the suggestion concerning 'On the Trail of the Germ.' I have just received and tested out the film this Saturday night in a local theater after the show of the night had closed. It is superb for my purpose, and tomorrow night, with fifty slides of the American Institute of Social Service on the 'Battle for Health' I have no doubt my church will present the best study on tuberculosis and fulfil the intent of the Sunday better than anywhere else on the American continent. My slides would have been sufficient but you put me in touch with the film and made me doubly efficient. I note, too, today a synopsis of 'A Curable Disease' advertised in Indianapolis for presentation next week and it is all right is every respect."

A postscript to the letter adds "Monday morn: A most thoroly satisfactory service last night." The above contains several things that it is well worth the while for the worker with the religious film to know. In particular we wish to call attention to the testing of the film in a local theater. The testing is a matter of course with every careful man but the idea of enlisting the help and sympathies of the exhibitor is excellent. We also wish to thank and congratulate the exhibitor. It is much more than courtesy for a tired man at the end of a busy Saturday night's work to give up twenty minutes to half an hour of well earned rest simply to help out another man, it is essentially one of the highest forms of Christian charity and a much bigger thing than most people are apt to realize nowadays. In another part of his letter Mr. Daugherty says:

> "I received from a personal friend, formerly in the picture business here, a page from THE WORLD with your article wherein you quote and criticize me. Your article is admirable in all respects, your criticisms constructive. I want to accord you my heartiest appreciation for the sanity of your treatment of the matters involved. You are on the path to do far reaching service in promoting up-to-date methods in church life and work for a better world."

The article he refers to is our "Picture in the Pulpit" in the issue of October 26, where we commented on his attitude towards what he called "Roman Catholic bias in garb and action" in many of the religious and moral photoplays. We had a personal correspondence with Mr. Daugherty on the subject and in one of his letters he says regarding the argument for our point of view:

> "I am weighing it and will doubtless follow the suggestion in full, for a kindly divergence in dogma and opinion will certainly be more in accord with the best spirit of the times than a militant aggressiveness against tenets and dogmas with which I disagree."

Our article was not intended to be a personal criticism but rather a help to others who might meet with the objection in question that Mr. Daugherty raised and we have quoted him as above not only to show that he did not take the criticism as personal, but also because others may be glad to learn that we are not alone in our opinion and because Mr. Daugherty himself has set us a good example that ought to be noted of the man who learned and had the courage to say so. Such a man is bound to find the truth and succeed.

Will You Not Help?

Some time ago one of our correspondents told us of an exchange man in the middle west who had been of considerable service and help to him in inaugurating the religious use of moving pictures in his parish work. Believing that a great deal of profit would come from learning what the exchange man's side of the question was, we wrote to this man and asked him what his experience in helping clergymen and educators in their particular kinds of work had been. He acknowledged the letter courteously and said he would be glad to tell us at his earliest opportunity to write, and we have just received his reply. We regret very much that it contains nothing of value to any one. It is mainly a laudation of the men who show their common sense by using the pictures and a criticism of all those who disapprove of them. The conditions he attacks have entirely disappeared and the two news items he refers to are stories of the long ago. We are only too glad to chronicle that ignorant and fanatical antagonism to the pictures is very rapidly disappearing (except perhaps in some back country districts where the people still think Grant and Lee are yet sitting under the apple tree at Appomattox) and we are calling attention to this correspondence simply because we wish to ask every exchange man who is willing to aid in promoting the educational use of the picture in a practical way, to let us know what his actual experience has been along these lines. We are no longer confronted by a theory; that day we are thankful to say has passed by. We are now face to face with a condition. There are actual workers in the field and their number is constantly increasing, and these people are trying their best to make the most of what is accessible and obtainable and to invent ways and means and methods by which the educational and religious use of moving pictures may be made of greater value to every one. We wish to hear from all practical workers about the things that have helped them and the difficulties they have met with, because these are the persons we are trying to help.

Signs of the Times.

Whatever may have been the situation a year ago, there are many signs today that cry aloud, "The times have changed." First there is the rapidly growing list of the religious and secular educationalists who are experimenting with and making use of the pictures. Secondly there is the work of the educational department of the General Film Company which is becoming better and more important every day. Again there is the changed attitude of the exchanges and exhibitors who are daily going more and more out of their way to aid and encourage the educationalists; and most significant of all is the fact that last month scarcely a week apart two of the most influential religious conventions of their kind seriously considered the adoption of the moving picture as a recognized instrument of their work. Facts such as these cannot be ignored and the manufacturers have already begun to realize their significance and possibilities. There has been a steady if small increase in the number of photoplays with a strong underlying moral which are suitable for sermonizing and religious teaching. There would be more, we believe, if the photoplaywrights who can plot would turn their attention in this direction. The number of Scriptural and religious subjects released lately or soon to be released is greater than ever, and setting aside such special productions as Kalem's "From the Manger to the Cross" and the forthcoming Thanhouser's "Star of Bethlehem," at least one company is already making a determined and definite effort to provide an elaborate series of religious films that will meet the demand of serious work. Every man who has read his WORLD carefully and intelligently and watched and attended to his business properly ought to have seen and already know all this; but for the benefit of those who may not have read thus between the lines we wish to repeat as emphatically as we can, the night of ignorance and prejudice is far spent, the day of enlightened progress and cooperation is at hand. The times have really changed and some men with them. Will you not join their ranks?

At Different Angles

Some Pertinent Observations, on Both Sides, Relative to Photoplays.

By Hugh King Harris.

TO one who enjoys the study of human characteristics, there is always a rich fund of philosophy and pleasure in listening to the remarks of photoplay audiences.

Seated before the screen the other evening, viewing the splendid views shown in "Cashmere," a lady was heard to remark, "How perfectly splendid. I do wish they would show at least one such film every night."

Later on I had a little chat with the manager of that same theater, he was complaining because he had to show "As You Like It," at an early date.

"Fact of the matter is," he remarked, "folks in this town don't care for the big educationals and classics. They want short snappy stuff, a live Essanay or Edison Comedy, a spirited Kalem railroad or adventure film, but let me advertise a religious piece or Shakespeare and it means an off day in the box office."

I do not care to dispute this manager, for he is old in the business, and is a better judge of actualities than any outsider could be, as far as his own box office is concerned, but I have always noticed a running fire of favorable comment in that theater when the "classics" did appear, and I contend that there is a sufficient majority of persons, and by the way, just the class of persons we all like to see coming to the motion-picture houses—who will fully repay any effort of maker or manager to supply the better class of films from an educational, scenic and classical standpoint.

The programs of Howe are indicative of popular taste, surely. He covers the country and is making money, he has an eye on the box office, and his program contains as LEADERS the travel and scenic, the higher class films. If a feature program taken about the U. S. makes good on this character of film, it is self evident there is ample demand for the same to warrant going after it.

I have heard on several occasions some person complain at the "break" in a film when some blow was about to be struck, a stage coach to be robbed, or a house "burgled."

"It is so provoking to have them never show the actual deeds, why don't they show every detail." Runs the trend of the comment along this line.

Why, indeed?

And here are editors, photo-playwrights and censors all working to make an artistic achievement of the covering up of these same acts, in order to get the film "across." If the public only knew how much work and worry is caused by not being able to "show it all"—there would be less complaint.

Some patrons call eternally for comedy, others desire the realistic westerns and other clamor for strong domestic scenes, while the manager out in front tries to please one and all with a program suitable for all tastes.

The different angles on which some makers work, to the advantage of all concerned was recently illustrated in a large playhouse in the middle west. A train wreck caused a delay in the delivery of films, with the consequent result there was a lot of scrimmaging to secure the supply of the local exchange and not disarrange bookings.

One theater, as mentioned, secured three films, and the manager cussed just a bit, as he saw they all were made by one film maker.

"Now for it, a bunch of three from the same house, it will be a poor programme, I am afraid."

When that programme was run it was found to contain a stirring western that was a treat, it contained a splendid "heart interest story" and a comedy split with a travel feature.

One of the most varied programmes the house ever produced and many a patron declared it was the best run of films that they had seen in many a day. This forcibly illustrates how the makers of films are bending every effort, striving every energy to supply service at an angle suited to every city, and to every patron of each theater therein.

GEORGE GREENBAUM.

The above illustration is a likeness of Mr. George Greenbaum, the American representative of the Vitascope Company, of Berlin, which has opened offices at 145 West 45th Street, New York City, with Mr. Greenbaum in charge. It is the intention of the Vitascope Company to release one feature subject every week. The first subject will be entitled, "The Unwritten Law," a feature drama which will be followed by "Custom House Station No. 12," a smuggling and aeroplane sensational production. Mr. Greenbaum is the son of Mr. Julius Greenbaum, president of the Vitascope Company.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

GREAT NEW ENGLAND CONVENTION.

THE motion picture exhibitors of New England are planning a great convention in Boston to which every exhibitor, big or small, licensed or independent, is most cordially invited, and urged for his own betterment to attend. The purpose of this convention is to form a strong, permanent, active organization for mutual co-operation and for the general elevation and improvement of the business as a whole. The success of this convention, and the stability of the organization to follow, necessitates the attendance of every exhibitor of New England who can possibly arrange to be present.

The convention will be held Tuesday, November 19th, at Commercial Hall, third floor, 694 Washington St., Boston, at 2 p.m. sharp. The feature speaker will be Mr. M. A. Neff, national president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League. Mr. Neff desires to affiliate the exhibitors of the New England states with the League, and promises to give those present some red-hot information in regard to the plans, purposes and achievements of the League.

There will be an informal dinner in the evening which everybody is likewise urged to attend. Mr. Neff will speak and it is believed that Mayor Fitzgerald can be induced to attend. The details have not yet been arranged; however, it is understood that the tickets will not be more than a dollar. To facilitate arrangements, will everybody who wishes a ticket for the dinner, please notify Mr. A. F. Washburn, 700 Washington St., Boston, as it is imperative that the number of people attending should be known in advance.

Advices from President Neff are to the effect that he will surely be in New York for the Exhibitors' Ball on November 14. After that event he will proceed to Boston to assist in the organization of the New England exhibitors.

Iowa State Convention Called.

The officers of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the State of Iowa have called a meeting to be held in Des Moines on the 3rd and 4th of December, 1912. The call has the endorsement of the National President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League. The motion picture exhibitors of Iowa are not only invited to attend the Des Moines convention but are urged to be present. The convention is held for the purpose of completing a thorough organization, and every exhibitor in the state is invited. A program will be published later.

Nebraska Will Have Convention.

A state convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors of the State of Nebraska is called to meet in Omaha on the 5th and 6th of December. Every exhibitor in the state is not only invited but urged to attend the convention. The convention is called for the purpose of organizing a State League which will be affiliated with the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

West Virginia Exhibitors to Meet.

A meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors of the State of West Virginia will be held on the 17th and 18th of December at Huntington, West Virginia. There will be big doings and much important business transacted. Many prominent exhibitors throughout the country will attend this gathering. The meeting is called by M. M. Wear, State President, and L. R. Thomas, State Secretary. There will probably be a new treasurer and first vice-president elected at this convention. President Neff will attend the convention.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, LEAGUE DECLARES ITSELF.

Editor The Moving Picture World,
New York City.

Dear Sir: Columbus Local No. 4, The M. P. E. L. of America, desires to compliment you on the stand you have taken against the American Tobacco Company's scheme to use the Motion Picture Industry to boost the sale of its cigarettes and thereby bring the Motion Picture Theaters into disrepute.

Columbus Local No. 4 has passed the following resolution and we trust organized Exhibitors everywhere will do likewise.

Be it resolved that the Motion Picture Exhibitors of the City of Columbus at a Meeting held at the Star Hotel on Sept. 17th at 2.30 P. M. go on record as being opposed to giving away premiums, coupons, trading stamps, etc., or accepting anything but a straight price of admission to their theaters.

And be it further resolved that on and after this date no Exhibitor will enter into any agreement with any individual firm or corporation dealing in trading stamps, merchants tickets or similar schemes until a special meeting of the Columbus Exhibitors is called and the matter brought to their attention and ratified by two-thirds of the Exhibitors present.

Yours truly,
MAX STEARN.

LAST CALL—EXHIBITORS' BALL.

THE stage is all set for the biggest social function that motion picture people have ever enjoyed. This affair will be the Second Annual Reception, Entertainment and Ball to be given by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Greater New York. Thursday evening, November 14th, is the date, and the Palm Garden, 58th Street and Lexington Avenue, New York City, will be the place.

For three months the Entertainment Committee has been making plans and preparations which have, at this time of writing, merged into a complete and perfect schedule that will carry the festivities along without a hitch, and with surprises following novelties throughout the evening. Most of the moving picture trade is already aware of the principal preparations that have been made, but lest there be one exhibitor anywhere within traveling distance who has not heard of the New York Exhibitors' Ball, it is well to recapitulate a little and mention some of the prominent features that have been secured by the entertainment committee.

The Lubin acting company will come over from Philadelphia, personally conducted by "Pop" Lubin, and will appear in a comedy sketch in the olio. The olio will be composed of advance views of the best film subjects of the various manufacturers, varied with personal appearances of many of the famous screen stars. The Chicago Essanay acting company will have a delegation on hand which will appear in the olio. The Imp company of players will present a playlet. Several of the Vitagraph players will appear individually as will also certain members of the Kalem, Thanhouser, Solax, Eclair and other companies. In addition to the regularly selected bill there will be prominent photoplayers drafted from the audience and compelled to get upon the stage and do their stunt, even if it is only to make a bow.

The Grand march will be lead by Mr. Maurice Costello and Miss Florence Lawrence and Mr. King Baggott and Miss Florence Turner. The music for the occasion will be furnished by the New York Hippodrome Band.

All indications point toward a landslide for the New York Exhibitors. Those who remember last year's ball are the only ones who can form a real idea of what this affair is going to be. It will be more than a landslide; it will be an avalanche. The only doubt is whether the Palm Garden will be big enough to hold the crowd. The one dance floor engaged last January certainly will not hold them all, therefore both dance floors have been engaged and the entire Palm Garden, which usually takes care of several different balls in an evening, will be entirely at the disposal of the New York Exhibitors' League.

There have been many inquiries received at the World office from exhibitors and others in regards to their eligibility as guests. The New York exhibitors wish it to be distinctly understood that this function is to be national in character. Any exhibitor or moving picture man or woman from any part of the United States, Canada, Europe, Asia, or Australia, is more than welcome. There have been a number of persons who are not connected with motion pictures who have inquired whether they would be admitted. The answer is that they will be admitted without question upon presentation of a ticket, the price of which is $1.00 per couple and fifty cents for each additional lady. These can be secured by mail or telephone from the New York League headquarters, 136 Third Avenue (telephone, 2568 Stuyvesant), or from any league theater in New York.

The object of this big gathering is to raise funds for the coming national convention of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, to be held in New York City during July of 1913. Every moving picture man or woman should consider it a duty to attend and assist the exhibitors in raising the business to a higher status. President M. A. Neff, of the National League of Exhibitors, will be present to welcome all. With him will be Ex-Senator Joseph B. Foraker, of Ohio, who is counsel for the League. Remember the date, November 14th, and the place, Palm Garden, and don't fail to be there.

President Samuel Trigger desires to inform the Brooklyn exhibitors that should any of them wish tickets to put on sale, he would like for them to call him up at the League rooms and he will send a messenger right over with the tickets. The Brooklyn men have not been neglected as some may be inclined to think, but the New York men have had their hands full.

PRESIDENT TRIGGER NAILS A CANARD.

The last issue of the Cincinnati Billboard prints a lurid story of dissensions in the ranks of the New York State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. It further stated that a new organization was planned, that there was widespread dissatisfaction over the manner in which the arrangements for the National Convention for next year are being handled, and that an attempt would be made to secure a new charter from the National League. There were a lot of other generalities.

Samuel H. Trigger, the president of the New York State Branch, when the article in question was called to his attention, said this was the first time he had heard of anything of the sort. Mr. Trigger says it can be taken from him that there is not even a basis for any such statements as are contained in this particular article in The Billboard; that there is perfect harmony in the State League, and that furthermore there is every reason to believe there will continue to be.

Another member of the State League, when asked in regard to the matter, said that undoubtedly the article was inspired by one against whom charges of irregularities have been in contemplation and that there was good reason to believe it was founded in malice.

Isadore Bernstein, of the International Feature Film Co., 145 West 45th Street, New York, has returned from a nation-wide trip. He reports twenty exchanges buying International Features.

VICE-PRESIDENT CORNELL IN TOWN.

Brings Word of the Construction of a New Theater and Office Building in Syracuse.

Vice-President B. E. Cornell, of the State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, is spending a few days in town with Mrs. Cornell. They are staying at the Grand Union Hotel. Mr. Cornell says that the picturemen of Syracuse are enthusiastic over their organization—and they are all in it. The exhibitors have agreed to limit all shows to four reels, to cut out vaudeville in picture shows, and to eliminate all advertising on the screen. It is also agreed that each exhibitor will display on his curtain an announcement that the coupons from cigarette packages will not be redeemed in his house.

Mr. Cornell brings word of the formation of a new company in Syracuse, the Eckel Company, which will put up a seven-story structure on the site of the old Kingsley House, a hotel which had stood for seventy years at Fayette Street, near Warren. The new building, which will be 125 by 66, on plot 167 by 66, will have many offices besides a theater containing seating capacity for 2,000 persons, of whom 1,600 will be accommodated on the main floor. The new house, which is expected to be open by May 1 next, will have an orchestra of seven. An independent electric plant will be installed.

The Eckel Company is composed of Peter Eckel, president; Henry Howell, secretary; B. E. Cornell, treasurer and manager. The company is incorporated for $125,000, with a capital stock of $90,000. It is intended to use Licensed service in the new house, for which as yet a name has not been chosen.

The interests behind the Eckel Company now own the Savoy Theater, in the immediate neighborhood, which has a seating capacity of 1,000, using Independent service, but the accommodations of which have been found insufficient to take care of its rapidly increasing patronage. The Savoy last Sunday, for instance, sold 5,433 tickets. This house has been open three years, being built especially for picture shows. It has an orchestra of five.

TO ORGANIZE WESTCHESTER EXHIBITORS.

On Tuesday, November 12, National President Neff and State President Trigger will organize the Exhibitors of Westchester County.

THE GORDON SQUARE THEATER.

We publish herewith a half-tone of a water-color painting of the Gordon Square Theater, situated at Detroit Avenue and West 65th Street, Cleveland, O. The house conforms in every way with the new state building code and cost about $60,000 to construct. The lot upon which the structure stands measures 110 by 180 feet. The entrance to the theater is through a handsome lobby, 20 feet by 40 feet in size. The building is constructed throughout of fireproof material and seats 1,500. Moving pictures and high-class vaudeville constitute the programmes.

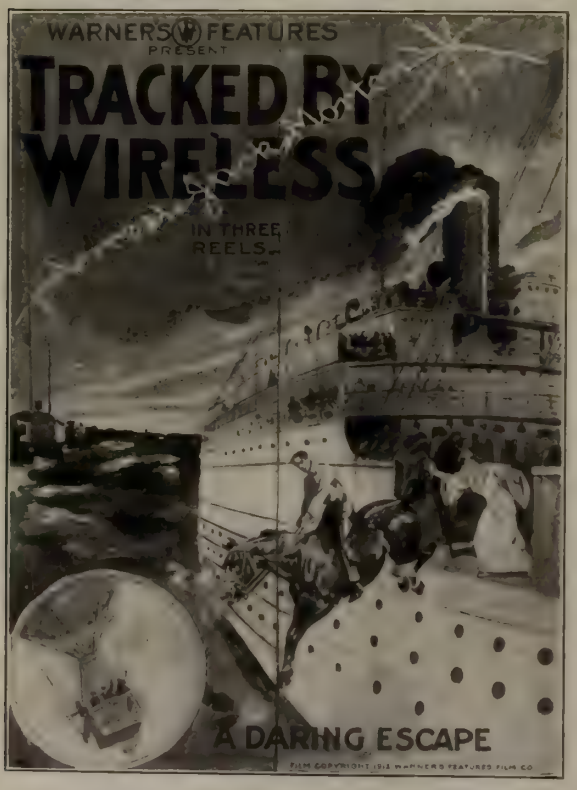
"Tracked by Wireless" (Warner's Feature).

LOVERS of sensational pictures will find in these three reels quite enough to satisfy them. Not that this film will be valued for its sensationalism alone. There are other characteristics—major ones—that will serve to make it a popular picture. Among these are the settings and the photography. As to the latter, it is of a quality it is pleasant to see. To the skill of the cameraman has been added the applied experience of the laboratory—there is a variation of light and shade, of tinting and toning, that charms as well as relieves the eye. As to the settings much may be said. There are many fine interiors and several notable outdoor scenes.

Perhaps the striking incident of the picture is where Jack, in his endeavors to elude the pursuing detectives, drives the horse on which he is seated over the side of a steamer into the water, and the following after him of Kate, the widow under the spell of the fascinating confidence man. Other scenes worthy of especial mention are those of Kate in the early part of the story, where she reclines on the tiger skin and folds her arms about the enormous head; of Kate receiving Jack in her garden in the arbor, with the effectively arranged back light; the arrest of



Poster Design for "Tracked by Wireless."

Jack's accomplice on the roof of the city's housetops in the distance; Jack's escape in the balloon; the Erl dance, in which more than a dozen comely maidens participate; another escape by Jack across the trelliswork to the ground; the third time the wily and slippery Jack gets away from the police, by horseback, with Kate behind him; the trip of the detectives to the wireless station and the sparks from the apparatus as the message is sent out into the ether; and the wild dash of Jack mounted on the faithful horse in his last futile attempt to escape—the climb up the sharp hill only to meet death at the jump.

Miss Gundrun Haalberg, of the Royal Theater of Copenhagen, plays Kate Holborn; Richard Jensen, also of the Royal, has the part of Jack Morton, and the friend of Jack Morton, Stacy Black, is portrayed by Olaff Fonss, of the Dagmar Theater, Copenhagen. The work of the three is clever—finished.

Mrs. Kate Morton is a widow of means; her home plainly indicates her financial standing. In a visit to a photographer's, she is struck by a portrait shown in a case with others. She induces the photographer to let her take away with her the picture which appeals to her as her ideal. Shortly after this, Kate has occasion to send to the jeweler's for repair a pearl necklace. As the jeweler is examining the string preparatory to putting it away, a well-dressed man enters, carrying an umbrella. As the tradesman is engaged in conversation with the man who brought in the pearls, the last comer draws his sleeve across the necklace and it is swept into the umbrella. As the latter turns to depart the jeweler discovers his loss. The stranger insists upon a search being made. The mystified tradesman apologizes. Nevertheless, he notifies the owner and the police. Kate responds immediately. As she enters the store she meets the original of the photo she had taken home. It is Jack Morton, come, as is his usual custom in such cases, to claim as his the umbrella which in the meantime has been suspended on the showcase. When Morton sees the charming woman in distress he gallantly shakes the umbrella, the necklace falls out and everyone is happy.

The police call at the store after Kate's departure. They recognize the umbrella trick as a specialty of one Morton. The jeweler identifies the police photograph of record. The detectives set out on the hunt for Jack and his confederate. The former has accepted the invitation of Kate to call. The two are becoming firm friends. The detectives arrest Black, and Jack narrowly escapes. As he and Kate are visiting the aeronautic grounds Morton discovers two detectives coming for him. He jumps for a balloon just being cut loose. As Kate has interfered with the officers he climbs into the basket and gets away.

Several months later Kate gives a garden party. Jack returns, sees the gathering, learns the cause, and bribes a dancer to let him take his place. He dons the garb of the entertainer and leads the Erl dance, which is finely done. Kate recognizes her lover. Jack has hardly got seated in his old home later in the evening when the police enter. He eludes the detectives narrowly, climbs over the latticework to the ground and gives the police the slip. Morton goes to Kate to say good-bye. She insists on joining him. They go to the stable, mount a horse and ride at top speed for the nearest steamer. The police, on the track, send a wireless to the captain of the ship, and as the vessel is about to anchor in port the commander puts Morton under arrest. Jack is on the horse's back. His only chance for escape is to drive the animal into the water, and that is what he does. Kate plunges in also. All swim ashore. There, after furious riding, uphill and down, in an effort to elude the police machine which has along shore followed the steamer, Jack realizes Kate's presence means his capture. He bids her good-bye and sets off alone. He climbs a steep hill which the machine cannot negotiate. The detectives clamber up the knoll, and at the crest peer over the edge of the sharp declivity. Morton has tried to jump his beast across one too many gullies, and the man who has so many times eluded his pursuers is lifeless at the base. The detectives assist Kate, who has followed afoot, to the side of her lover. What had at first been her ideal had become her idol. The first had been shattered figuratively, the second physically.

POWER NOT CONTEMPLATING ANOTHER MACHINE.

We wish to correct a statement made in last week's Number, regarding the interview of our representative with Mr. Nicholas Power. Through a typographical error one word was omitted which, while trivial in itself, entirely changes the meaning of the statement which we intended to make. It should have appeared as follows:

> "The Nicholas Power Company will soon put a new machine control on the market. It is claimed it will be perfect in every detail."

The Nicholas Power Company have just perfected, and are about to place on the market a most excellent mechanical speed control for motor driven machines. It overcomes the troubles and criticisms of the electrical speed controllers for both alternating and direct current. It is prophesied that it will become very popular.

C. LANG COBB AT LIBERTY.

C. Lang Cobb, who has been in charge of the sales department of the Reliance Company for some time, resigned that position last week and is now considering offers from several companies. Mr. Cobb is in receipt of a very flattering letter of commendation from Mr. A. V. Ritchey, who expresses the opinion that Mr. Cobb is a hustler with good ideas and is a thoroughly reliable and valuable man.

Edison Players Return

Hard Work in London Under Adverse Conditions Made Them Happy to Get Home.

WHEN the American Transport Line steamer "Minnehaha" docked at its pier in New York City on October 22nd, among the passengers who disembarked was a little company of photoplayers, members of the Edison staff who had been spending the summer in England, to whom the tall buildings of New York City were a most delightful sight. This little company, headed by Director Ashley Miller, consisted of the cream of the Edison players, Mr. Marc McDermott, Miss Mary Fuller and Miss Miriam Nesbitt who went abroad early in the summer for the purpose of securing local color for a number of photoplays which the Edison Company had in the making. Concerning the trip Mr. Miller was not enthusiastic and emphasized the fact that he was again pleased to be back home again.

"We got what we went after and a little more," he said, to a representative of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD, "but I don't know when I have put in a more disagreeable, nerve-racking time, as you have probably heard the season in London was extremely cold. It was even a record-breaker in that respect—colder than they had experience in many years, and we were correspondingly uncomfortable. With the cold came rain and cloudy, foggy weather, not at all suitable for picture-making. We had to watch our chance, read the weather reports and telephone around to different localities outside of London to learn if the sun was shining anywhere within reach. The situation got on my nerves, and I think I lost more sleep last summer than at any previous time in my existence. We simply had to get those scenes and the dodging about looking for the sun to shine was some task.

"But altogether we were very well satisfied with the trip and, as I observed before, we got more than we expected, which, in a way, compnsated for the troubles we had to endure in getting it. As you have probably heard, we did some of the 'Mary' pictures, for which purpose Miss Fuller came on after the rest of us had reached London. We got some scenes for some more Dickens pictures and for a number of other typical English subjects. We were well received by the people over there and had all the co-operation necessary, the police helping us out on a number of occasions.

'One instance that was rather amusing was in connection with the suffragette pictures which we were taking. We were at Trafalgar Square and the scene was typical of the campaign the English suffragettes are waging. In the midst of the scene, when one of the women players was making a demonstration, a bystander sailed into the mob and began laying right and left about him with his cane, shouting 'We have had too much of this thing here.' It took the efforts of a number of London 'bobbies' to extricate the fellow and quiet him down. He proved to be a retired soldier and there was a good laugh coming when he learned that it was only for a moving picture.

"Some of our party made a flying trip to Paris before we started home, but all of us are glad to get back and not at all anxious to go through another London season like the last."

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD reproduces herewith some very good likenesses of this little company of English players. They scarcely need any further introduction, for our readers are all familiar with their faces. Mary Fuller has done a great deal of remarkably good work and the Edison pictures are enhanced by her presence. It would not be stretching the imagination any to say that Marc McDermott is probably the most versatile of the motion picture stars. The range of characters which he has assumed covers almost all of which the male is capable and in every instance the verdict has been "well done." Miss Nesbitt has proved herself to be a most capable actress and her charm of manner is always pleasing to the observer. Of Mr. Miller's work a great deal in the way of praise might be said. He has filled the position of director at the Edison studio for several years, coming to that position from the field of the legitimate drama in which he had gained some reputation as an actor and stage manager. He has a large number of Edison successes to his credit. Mr. Miller was accompanied on this trip by his wife, professionally known as Ethel Browning. Favorable mention is also due the cameraman, Mr. Bredeson, who shared the pleasures and a large proportion of the tribulations of this little company, for the weather was not such as a cameman would pick out for a trip of this kind. Some of the pictures taken by the Edison Company abroad are already appearing in the list of releases.

A. W. HALE AROUND AGAIN.

Albert W. Hale, who recently resigned his position with the Mutual Film Corporation, and who in about two weeks will join the Famous Players' forces as general assistant to Mr. Porter, is about following a successful operation at the Neurological Hospital.

RELIANCE ADDS ANOTHER FEATURE.

The Reliance Company will release a two-reel feature every other Wednesday, commencing with "Don Caesar de Bazan" on Wednesday, November 20th.

The Moving Picture Educator

GUILTY!

AN accusation—a railing accusation—has just been brought against the moving pictures, accusing them of being despoilers of trade—a certain trade—which is one of the most profitable all over the American Continent. Not only is the accusation true in fact but in substance, and there is no escape from the consequences, neither are there any mitigating conditions, or extenuating circumstances; the moving pictures must face the issue and accept the responsibility, for they are completely and thoroughly GUILTY. To strengthen the accusation it must be noticed that it does not come from single, lonely or irresponsible individuals, it comes from organized tradespeople in council assembled, speaking through the reports of their qualified official. The Liquor Dealers' Association, composed of saloon-keepers, brewers, rumsellers and all allied trades, annoyed at the continued decrease in their previously boasted receipts, declare: "The many nickels (hundreds of thousands of them) which the great body of workingmen used to spend in their places are now diverted to the moving pictures; the workingman now takes his family there to such an extent, that the lessening of the liquor dealers' income is appalling to the extent of demanding attention." If any admirer of the pictures could have argued that they were effective in preventing the growth of the greatest vice of the day, such an argument might have been denied by those at whose business it was aimed. The truth is, however, that so great have been the inroads into the vital part of their business that they are compelled to come out in the open and call for "quarter." This result was not sought for by the moving pictures; they were never intended to hurt any trade; if, however, they are the means, educationally of improving the moral, the social and financial wellbeing of the people, their guilt in overcoming any vice is a virtue redounding to their honor.

As it is now brought so authentically and officially before us, it is worth while looking into the merits of the occasion so far as the action of the moving picture is concerned in its relation to the drink question.

In the main that action has been chiefly passive; the moral and educational added to the entertaining value of the pictures have taught the average workman that there is a social place now preferable to the saloon, and also a place offering a better value for his nickel, as also for the nickels he can spare for his family, who now can join him in a social manner. It must be confessed that there is also an active element in the picture which must tell against the great business of the liquor dealers. No working man who ever sees the two great temperance pictures produced by the Pathe and Eclair firms respectively will ever again (if he has any humanity in him) allow even a stray nickel to find its way to a place where all other crimes in the decalogue find their birth. In a word, then, the accusations against the pictures is timely and well taken; may their guilt in this respect continue to increase so long as there is an evil which they can counteract.

The positive aspect of this discussion emphasizes a fact many times previously pointed out, that in its proper right use the cinematograph is a great factor for good. In the relationship of this article, the great temperance question never had a greater advocate, orator or illustrator; convincing and educating to the fullest extent, throwing both the light of exposure and truth in dark places and upon doubtful questions. In like manner, there are other subjects which will suffer or benefit as the case may be, and it will never need the friends of the pictures to advocate its forces, virtues or helpfulness. This may safely be left (as in this particular instance) to those who are hurt or distressed, for their lamentations and protestations will call attention to their own demerits, while pointing out the merits of the power which has made possible such changes, long sought for, but hitherto made difficult. May the moving pictures still be found guilty of many greater reforms in its educational progress.

MOTIVES OF PROMINENT ACTORS.

From time to time we are made acquainted with the motives which have induced many prominent actors to enter the field of moving picture reproductions of their efforts. A study of these motives leaves little room to detect either a desire for self-adulation or personal aggrandizement; they are too accustomed to being "in the limelight" to be unduly carried away with egotistical ideas. Some with a p rdonable pride in the accomplishments with which they are endowed, supported with a strong faith in the value of the character they portray, see in the moving pictures an opportunity to appear before millions instead of thousands, thereby legitimately increasing their own fame while giving a wider scope to whatever dominant characteristics of value are enshrouded in that which they reveal.

Others tell us that they see in the moving picture room and opportunities to accomplish many an ambition, or an ambitious project, impossible within the limitations of the stage. A play once well acted is finished for all time, making the tiresome dull monotony of too frequent repetitions unnecessary, besides giving occasion for more and greater efforts. Those of the Madame Bernhardt class say they see an opportunity to immortalize things that appear to be of equally immortal value.

True, they themselves are carried forward into a future they can never expect to see, but if any vanity lurks within the thought, a generous world will overlook that human weakness, while appreciating the greater good they accomplish, awarding a due measure of praise to be continued until a greater successor appears. Histrionic ability is recorded so that future generations may pass judgment upon, or perhaps learn lessons from, their predecessors. The moving picture certainly seems that perfect style of acting which Shakespeare causes Hamlet to require of his "players" when, concerning their speech, he demands that they "do not mouth it as if the town crier spoke the words," such mouthing being impossible in the silent picture; we have only to fear lest in motion efforts they "do not saw the air." Of this latter proscribed fault we have no fear; the actor of to-day (in the moving picture studios) is conscious of the fact that his actions are more closely watched and followed than is either customary or necessary upon the stage; the result being a more perfect reproduction or delineation, sufficient to satisfy the fastidiousness of Shakespeare himself.

Thus the general motives are high: indeed, high above the average of a former standard. The moving picture has elevated the actor, his profession and his work. The actors and actresses in turn have responded by a high endeavor to prove equal to the occasion, the result being an educational uplift to everything connected with that great art. Of the highest class of entertainment which has through all ages thrilled humanity, these high motives are the best assurances for the future.

TOLEDO EXCHANGE MAN VISITS CHICAGO.

Mr. and Mrs. H. R. Ashbrook, from Toledo, spent a few days in Chicago last week. They visited the American studio and plant, witnessed a private demonstration of advance releases and expressed themselves in very decided and favorable terms about the excellent equipment and facilities with which quite a number of Eastern Companies could make no comparison. Incidentally, he remarked that "Flying A" products were meeting excellent results in the Toledo territory.

AMERICAN SPLIT-REEL COMEDIES.

American Film Manufacturing Co. announces that it will shortly release split-reel comedies. This line of subjects has been given most careful consideration and the results secured are highly pleasing and will no doubt add considerably to the exclusive variety now being offered by this company.

Coming of William Penn and the Treaty with the Indians.

Historical Pageant in Pictures

Magnificent Spectacle at Philadelphia Secured by Spanuth for State Rights Feature.

FEW people knew and still fewer gave any thought to a remarkable historical pageant which occurred in the city of Philadelphia during the week of October 7 to 12, yet on that occasion there was enacted upon the broad green of Fairmount Park one of the most interesting and dramatic spectacles ever given in America; equal, in a way, to the wonderful Durbar which marked the raising of the present King George V to the throne of the Emperor of India. This remarkable pageant typified the events of America's history beginning with the exploration and settlement of the country round about Philadelphia, leading up by successive episodes and scenes to the Declaration of Independence, of the strife which followed, down to the year 1854 when the various villages in the vicinity of the original colony became consolidated under the present city government.

In this pageant more than 5,000 persons participated. Many of these were direct ascendants of the early settlers of that city and other regions of the United States. The book of the pageant was written by Francis Howard Williams and the event was organized and staged under the direction of Ellis Paxson Oberholtzer. It was patronized by many of the leading citizens of Philadelphia headed by the Hon. Rudolph Blankenburg, Mayor of the city, as president. Large financial contributions were made by Hon. John Wanamaker, Cyrus H. K. Curtis, James McCrea, E. T. Stotesbury, George F. Baer, Hon. Samuel W. Pennypacker and others of national reputation. On the committees, honorary and active, were enrolled the names of the leading men and women of the city of brotherly love.

Tournament in Honor of Sir William Howe at Philadelphia.

It is conservatively estimated that had the persons engaged in this undertaking been paid at the minimum compensation accorded picture actors, it would have cost $500,000. To this should be added the cost of the thousands of costumes designed to fit the various periods covered by the pageant and you have an undertaking which no manufacturer in this or in any other country would dream of putting into pictures.

There were the landing of the immigrants, the early settlers of Pennsylvania, the building of block houses and dwellings, the wars with the Indians, the wars between the colonies; for the Dutch, the Swedes and the English contended for their possession of Pennsylvania. Then came the breaking out of the war for Independence, the crowning event of which, so far as Philadelphia was concerned, was the battle of Germantown. This scene was put on with all the circumstances of real war. Hundreds of soldiers took part and the historic fight at the Chew mansion was fought over again. Then there was the reception of Benjamin Franklin at the court of France, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the ratification of the constitution of the United States, the reception of President Washington, the visit of Lafayette to America and other notable events which occurred in and about the city of Philadelphia.

As before observed, no moving picture manufacturer would think of undertaking such a stupendous work, but there was nothing to prevent the ubiquitous cameraman from being on the scene, and he was there through the enterprise of Mr.. H. A Spanuth of the General Film Publicity and Sales Company, who secured the exclusive right to make pictures of this extraordinary historical pageant. Many of the details of this picture have already been described in the advertising pages of the Moving Picture World. Demands upon our space forbids any extended description, but no great imagination is necessary to conceive the importance of the subject. Not only as a feature but one having great educational value. Mr. Spanuth's company is offering this remarkable subject on extremely favorable terms with an abundance of advertising material. It is something which must appeal to exhibitors generally.

Mr. Spanuth reports that he is receiving many inquiries for this subject and anticipates a large sale.

REMOVAL NOTICE.

The New York Motion Picture Company have removed their offices from 150 East 14th Street, New York City, to the New Long Acre Building, Broadway and 42d Street, where they have a new and beautiful suite of offices. This change is caused by the large and rapidly increasing business of the company. Messrs. Kessel and Bauman will be glad to welcome old and new friends in their new quarters.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

THE following letter from M. A. Neff, president of the M. P. E. L. of America, shows in unmistakable terms his stand on the question of the misrepresentation of films by misleading posters and titles:

"I have just read your remarks in regard to the posters and titles of pictures which are shown outside of motion picture theaters which are not shown in the theater. This is not fair to the public, and your remarks are timely and to the point, and I hope you will continue to agitate this matter. Cinematography cannot lie, and it is the instrument by which the public is being educated, and it is not right that any exhibitor should impose upon the achievements of any camera man, or manufacturer, through misrepresentation.

"In observing closely, I have noticed that any misrepresentation on the part of the exhibitor in regard to his program has caused the public to lose confidence, and it is embarrassing to every exhibitor in the United States, as it has a tendency to decrease the confidence in all motion picture shows. In passing through St. Louis the other day I noticed a sign stating that six first run pictures were shown every day. I only had a few minutes, but stepped in and the first picture that greeted me was over ninety days old. These are the statements and advertisements that cause the honest exhibitor and those who are trying to elevate cinematography much trouble and money. I hope that you will bring this matter prominently to the front, as these conditions should be eliminated."

The co-operation of all right-minded exhibitors on this important question will go far toward stamping out the evil of misrepresentation. Let us give these unprincipled fellows the limelight of publicity. They must reform or be driven out of the business.

An Insolent Proposition to Picture Theaters.

It is urgently requested that exhibitors throughout the country will refuse to join hands with the American Tobacco Company in its plan to advertise a certain brand of cigarettes. The picture theater is the popular resort for the boys and girls of the nation, and proprietors and managers know that their best interests lie in keeping the moral atmosphere of their houses above reproach. Cigarette smoking is one of the curses of the race and boys should be protected from this pernicious habit in every possible way.

Just think of the insolence of this company! It plans to make every moving picture house a station at which its coupons can be cashed! It is directly aiming at the boys who attend picture theaters and seeks to make profit by the ruin of the nation's youth. This is a matter that should be settled in no uncertain way, right at the start. He would be a nearsighted man who could consider for a moment such a prostitution of his picture theater.

J. D. Williams Enters New Zealand.

J. D. Williams has extended his interests to New Zealand. With picture palaces in Melbourne and Sydney, he has secured the Adelphi Theater in Wellington and contemplates acquiring large theaters in Christchurch, Auckland and Dunedin.

Mr. Williams is a live wire in the exhibiting and renting field and sets the pace for all competitors in publicity. He thinks nothing of taking several pages in the leading newspapers at a time, with the result that he is the best known showman in the Antipodes. And he has accomplished all his big doings within three years.

Chicago Film Brevities.

John R. Freuler, general manager of the Mutual Film Corporation, has not resigned that position as was stated in my last letter. Mr. Freuler states that at no time had he contemplated taking such a step.

Frank L. Hough, Jr., has resigned his position in the Kinetoscope department of Thomas A. Edison, Inc., and has been appointed manager in charge of the projecting machine department of the Kleine Optical Company, with Charles Kaufman as chief assistant. Mr. Hough is well known to the trade and has a large following.

Chas. Vance, proprietor of the Dawn Theater, Streator, Ill., was a visitor last week. He reported very satisfactory business.

The Empress Theater, Nebraska City, Neb., owned by Ballou & Hagel, will be finished about November 15. This is one of the most elaborate and costly picture houses in the State. The structure cost $15,000 and will seat 500 people.

S. L. Warner, of Warner's Features, came into the city last week from Minnesota, where he had been for some time. Mr. Warner reported business as being very flourishing. Every exhibitor visited by him spoke of the large increase in business. The Warner's product is proving very popular. The "Peril of the Plains," released October 14, has made a big success in Minnesota.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. H. R. Ashbrook, of Toledo, were in the city Tuesday, October 29. Mr. Ashbrook is manager of the Mutual Film Corporation in Toledo, Ohio. Mr. and Mrs. Ashbrook called at the offices of the American Film Mfg. Company and were taken out to the American plant, in North Edgewater, by Manager Nehls. Mr. Ashbrook declared himself as delighted with its fine equipment and facilities. The Film Supply Company's product is in big demand in Toledo, Mr. Ashbrook says.

KINEMACOLOR IN GRAND CANYON.

Dramatic Productions Staged Amid the Beauties and Difficulties of Western Wonderland.

The special train engaged for the Kinemacolor acting forces on their trip to winter quarters left Jersey City three weeks ago. Already from the West have come encouraging reports of the work being done by the three large dramatic companies. The train was sent over a schedule that allowed a rest of a day for the entire company at Williams, Arizona, two sections proceeding the following morning to the new Kinemacolor Studio at Hollywood, Los Angeles, Cal.

From the accepted scenarios which have been accumulating for several months Mr. Miles, the chief director, had picked several to be acted amid the grandeur of that Western Wonderland—the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River. One of the film plays was staged at a place called Turtle's Head, to reach which it was necessary to ride eighteen miles on burro-back along a trail which descended 3,000 feet during the first mile and then zig-zagged back and forth, so that the only picture made that day was one of the sun slowly setting in the West, just as the party reached their camping place.

The pack mules carry tents, which were used by the women of the party, the men preferring an experience in open-air-camping. Though they took what they considered plenty of blankets, it was found shortly after nightfall that not a tenth part of the necessary preparations against cold had been made, so it was a very thankful party that greeted the morning. In order to get many of the pictures in the proper way, it was necessary for the cameramen to scale cliffs or be lowered down great precipices with ropes. The burro could cling to the very outer edge of the trail with perfect safety, but to those not experienced in such traveling the canyon held a thrill for every minute of the day. It was necessary to make a start for camp each day at 3 o'clock, in order to get out of the awful chasm before dark. Being lost there was a horror no one wanted to contemplate.

It was a tired and peculiar looking lot of men and women who hobbled to the station and boarded the train which was to take them to the winter quarters with the rest of the company in California, but they all voted that the work was worth the pains, for in these Kinemacolor releases something remarkable will be given to the public.

GAUMONT SHOWS HOW NEW YORKERS TRAVEL.

The success with which New Yorkers get on in life and incidentally their daily traffic showing how the spirit moves and also the body is depicted in the Gaumont film "How New York Travels," to be released on the Saturday Great Events' split reel on November 30. Here is shown how six million people travel daily and the system of transportation which conveys the population of the second largest city of the world from the wilds of Brooklyn to the darkest Bronx. All kinds of trolley cars are shown. There are also pictures of the subway car which travels to and fro in the largest hole in the world and also of the elevated and of the Fifth Avenue bus.

There are views of the Brooklyn Bridge and last but not least of the electric patrol wagon.

MAJESTIC RELEASES THEIR THIRD REEL.

Commencing Thursday, November 21, the Majestic Motion Picture Company will release a split reel of slapstick comedy. Great care has been exercised in selecting comedians to put this work over.

Music for the Picture

BY CLARENCE E. SINN

TIPS ON IMPROVISING.

IN modulating to a foreign key it is a safe rule to always aim for the dominant seventh chord of the key you wish to change to; lead up your chords toward the dominant seventh rather than to the tonic chord of the new key. I don't mean that this is the only correct way, but that it is a satisfactory plan always sure to be pleasing to the ear. The reason for this is that when we hear the dominant 7th chord we naturally anticipate the tonic chord of the new key, and when this follows there is a sense of completion. There is a reason, too, for this anticipation. The seventh note in any scale is called the "leading note":

C D E F G A B C
1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8

In the key of C the 7th note is "B" and is therefore the leading note. The tendency of this note is to ascend to the next note above—to the key-note. The 4th note ("F") on the contrary has a tendency to descend to the note immediately below. F and B are both found in the dominant 7th of the key of C:

g b d f

and this tendency of the "f" to descend and the "b" to ascend is what leads the ear to expect this progression:

f e d c b g

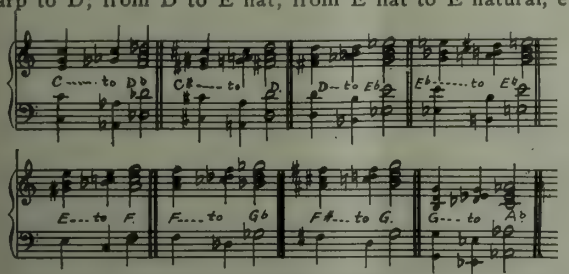
which is the tonic chord of C—the natural progression. By taking advantage of this it is an easy matter to modulate directly from any key to the one a half tone above; as, from the key of C to the key of C sharp (or D flat); from C sharp to D; from D to E flat; from E flat to E natural, etc.



You will notice in the above illustration that the first chord is C; in the next chord the note C becomes the leading note of the scale of D flat, and (as combined with the other notes of the chord) its tendency is to ascend to D flat. The second chord, of course, is the dominant 7th of the key of D flat. To avoid confusion the note E flat has been omitted, though it belongs to the chord. The example is given to point out the tendency of the 4th to descend and the leading note to ascend, and their consequent usefulness in progressing to a key one-half note above a given key.

The Diminished Seventh.

The chord of the "diminished seventh" is another very useful chord in modulation; it is not too much to term this chord invaluable. It is formed by raising the fundamental note of a dominant 7th chord one-half tone. For example, the dominant 7th chord in the key of C is composed of the notes G, B, D and F; by raising the note G one-half tone (making it G sharp) we get the following chord of the diminished 7th:

d
b
g sharp

Now, by lowering any note in this chord one-half tone we will get a dominant seventh chord of some key.

In the first chord of the above illustration, we lower the note F one-half tone (to E), which gives us the dominant seventh chord of A major (it could be A minor also). In the second chord we lower the note G sharp to G natural, which gives us the dominant 7th of C (major or minor); for the purposes of this illustration we will regard G sharp and A flat as the same note, so in the following chord (whose intervals sound the same as the first) we lower the note B to B flat and get the dominant 7th of E flat; in the next and last chord we lower the note D to D at and get the dominant 7th of G flat. Technically speaking, the B natural also becomes C flat, though we do not need to bother with that at present. Through this one chord we are enabled to modulate directly to A, C, E flat and G flat (major or minor).

I said that for the purposes of illustration we would regard G sharp and A flat at the same notes. To fend off criticism I will explain how the above two chords are obtained. The first diminished 7th has already been shown. The second is made from the chord B flat, D, F and A flat (the dominant 7th of E flat. By raising the note B flat a half-tone we get the chord:

A flat
D
B natural and these intervals sound on the piano exactly the same as an inversion of the first chord in the illustration. Compare them:

A flat G sharp
F F
D D
B B

If we take a liberal view that these two chords are practically the same, we might say that the twelve chords of the diminished 7th (there is one built on each of the 12 notes of the chromatic scale), may all be found in these three:

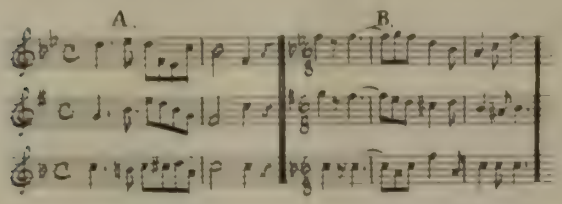
F F sharp G
D E flat E
B C C sharp
G sharp A B flat

F sharp may be written G flat; E flat may be D sharp; C sharp may be D flat, and G sharp A flat, but they sound the same on the piano. The difference is called enharmonic and only exists technically.

It is possible to go from one diminished 7th chord to another, though the descending scale (chromatic) is agreed to be the most pleasing. It is possible to form a diminished 7th from any dominant 7th, and from the resulting chord to form another dominant 7th and so on indefinitely. By the ease with which we may progress to almost any chord of the diminished 7th, and the power to progress from this chord to any one of four keys (either major or minor), as shown in the second illustration, we see how rich in possible modulations it is.

In picture playing it is often necessary to "blend" one movement with another; to glide as nearly imperceptibly as possible from one number to the next. Modulation plays an important part in this phase of picture-playing technique, but it is not all. When the two numbers to be connected are of widely different movement the figure of each must be considered, and, unless a marked change of tempo is wanted, the connecting phrase should be such that the "break" between the two movements is not too startling.

By "figure" is meant the form made by notes of different lengths. This is entirely apart from the melody. A "figure" can be written for a drum as well as for any other instrument:



In this illustration ("A") are shown three different melodies, yet the figure is identical in each one. We have a dotted quarter note followed by an 8th; then a group of four 8th notes. The second measure contains a half note, a quarter and a quarter rest. In example B we find the three phases to be also alike in figure, though the melody is different in each one. When it is possible to end a strain before going to the next number, it may not be so necessary to lead by a connecting phrase into the movement of the following tempo, but when you are obliged to change in the middle of a phrase—or in the middle of a strain, as is so often the case, it is a good idea to anticipate the figure of the movement to come. Sometimes this may be done by a simple succession of notes of the same tone and same length (eighths or quarters) for one hand while the other fills in the modulating chords if any are necessary.

FILM THIEF GETS YEAR SENTENCE.

As an indication of how thoroughly the Moving Picture World is read in all quarters, it may be of interest to our readers to know that within one week from the time a reward was offered for the arrest of a New York film thief, the guilty man, in custody of an officer from the district attorney's office, was on his way from Chicago to New York to answer the charges against him.

In our issue of Sept. 21, 1912, a reading notice and advertisement appeared stating that there had been stolen from the Feature Film Co., of New York, 108 East Twelfth St., "The Forged Bill," a one-reel feature, and "Madeline," a four-reel feature. A reward of fifty dollars was offered for the arrest of one Max Sokolow, alias Max Stanley, who rented the reels and disappeared with them and other reels belonging to other exchanges. By the time the reward notice appeared in print, these pictures were being shown in Chicago. An operator in one of the theaters picked up his copy of The World and read that the great feature being advertised by the "opposition" house was "stolen goods." Following instructions in the notice, the operator communicated with the W. J. Burns Detective Agency, who were on the case, with results as above stated.

Sokolow was tried before Judge Swann, in New York, Special Sessions, and sentenced to one year for larceny. The operator received the $50 reward.

THE UNIVERSAL IN ITS NEW HOME.

Takes Possession of its Ample Quarters in the Mecca Building, on the White Way.

THE Universal Film Manufacturing Company is in its new home, on the third floor of the Mecca Building, at 1600 Broadway, at the corner of Forty-Eighth St. The entire floor will be devoted to Universal uses. Not only will there be sufficient space adequately to accommodate all of the company's executive force under present conditions, but due allowance has been made for future expansion. The furnishings and fittings are all in mahogany, and the appearance of the offices indicates solidity, substantiality. As the building fronts on Broadway, Forty-Eighth Street and Seventh Avenue, there is an abundance of natural light. The windows all bear in alternation the corporation name and the Universal trademark, and will be conspicuous on the upper White Way.

The outer reception room is in onyx marble, ornamented by a large stained glass window bearing the Universal trade mark. The inner reception room is spacious, and is finished in the prevailing mahogany. The telephone switchboard has a capacity of seven trunks and forty extensions. There is a complete system of sprinklers throughout the floor. In the center of the building adjoining the reception room sits Charles Simone, who entertains out-of-town visitors and exchange men. There is ample provision for a large corps of stenographers. The shipping department, under the charge of J. W. Ward, also has extensive quarters in the center of the floor. The fire-proof vault for the storage of film has capacity for several thousand reels. There is a projection room 25 by 50 feet, which will be furnished with large and comfortable armchairs. The projection booth is fireproof, well ventilated and contains two projectors.

The office of the president of the Universal, C. H. Laemmle, is in a large room at the corner of Broadway and Forty-eighth street. Here he will have ample space in which to conduct the rapidly expanding business of the corporation. Ranging in order along Broadway are the offices of W. H. Swanson, secretary; Joe Engel, in charge of the sales department; Joe Brandt, the advertising and publicity man of the Universal; Mark M. Dintenfass, foreign department; Thomas Bedding, editor of the Universal Weekly; C. V. Henkel, general accountant and office manager. Fronting on Forty-eighth street are the offices of David Horsley, the treasurer, and P. A. Powers, vice-president. At the corner of Seventh Avenue there is a well-equipped directors' room. The company will have in reserve ample space for the installation of an exchange if in the future this should be decided on.

FAMOUS DE LA GUERRA MANSION USED IN AMERICAN PICTURES.

Aside from the story itself, which deals with the early customs of California, the historic backgrounds used in the American release, "Her Own Country" are of more than passing interest. The famous home of the De La Guerras, built in 1828 by Don José De La Guerra y Noriega, is used in this picture. It is generally conceded that the leading Spanish family in Santa Barbara is that of De La Guerra, often wrongly called Noriega from a misapprehension of the Spanish patronymic with the prefix "y" ("and") after their father's; this, however, is a matter of compliment to the mother, and the father's remains the lawful family name. Thus, the founder of this family from his mother being a Noriega was called De La Guerra y Noriega. This old structure is one of the show places of Santa Barbara, and is in a remarkable state of preservation. It is built in the form of a parallelogram with a large patio in front. Within this enclosure the elite of the early Californian period were wont to gather to the fandango and carnivals which were their forms of amusement. Don José De La Guerra y Noriega was district judge during his lifetime. Here it was that Richard Henry Dana attended the marriage, as he describes in his book, "Two Years Before the Mast," of his agent to the Donna Anita De La Guerra y Noriega, youngest daughter of Don Antonio Noriega, who was at that time (1836) the grandee of Santa Barbara. In this picture old costumes of the De La Guerra family that had been preserved for generations are worn by the members of the American company, through the courtesy and kindness of the present members of this household. With the assistance of Alexander F. Harmer, who designed the scenery and costumes for "Natoma," the scenes of which were laid in Santa Barbara and written by J. D. Redding and Victor Herbert, and in which Mary Garden recently starred, "Her Own Country," to be released November 28, will be historically correct as to detail and mannerisms. Even to the greetings, old Spanish cordiality will be reproduced exactly.

"MAX GETS THE REWARD" (C. G. P. C.).

Max Linder, the king of fun-makers, presents another clever C. G. P. C. comedy. He is aided by some scientific trick photography in his demonstrations of the method of robbery by personal magnetism. The film will be released on November 15th.

For diversion Max undertakes the study of the principles of magnetism and soon learns how to extract pocketbooks and other rather personal belongings from passers-by. He considers it a great joke, but the victims think otherwise, and, accordingly, notify the police. A detective is assigned to the case and a reward is offered for the apprehension of the mysterious burglar. Then begins the battle of wits. The detective becomes suspicious of Max and sets a trap for him. The trap is a logical one, for by it Max is invited to call upon a young lady admirer and give an exhibition of his powers. Max, flattered, accepts the invitation, but one glance at the sleuth in the guise of a young girl is enough to tip Max off to the situation. Feigning that he is unaware of the detective's real identity, Max watches him grow careless through over-confidence and with a dexterous movement has him at his mercy. Max places the now helpless official in a canvas sack and then, disguising himself as the detective, he turns the bundle over to the chief of police and is quickly paid the reward.

Doings at Los Angeles

Unusual Activity in All Los Angeles Studios—An Interesting Budget of News from the Coast.

THE return of the Biograph comedy company, and the arrival of two new companies which are now installed in permanent quarters, has added 90 people to the rapidly growing motion picture colony now in Los Angeles. The Biographers consisted of 19 people, then followed the Powers company with 26 more and now the Kinemacolor forces have arrived from New York with 46 people. All three companies are actively at work.

The Powers company is now located at the Universal studio in Hollywood where it is engaged in making comedies and dramas. H. C. Matthews is the director and H. C. Blackmore and Charles Manley are among the leading people. Manley is probably the oldest actor now working in moving pictures. He is 81 years of age and as active as a boy. The company brought along two talented child actresses, Early Gorman and Mattie Roubert and plans to make a series of children's pictures before returning to New York early next summer.

Following the Powers company the Kinemacolor company arrived a couple of days later. It took six special cars to bring them and their belongings, not to mention several carloads of properties which are coming by freight.

Jacob Kempner, San Francisco representative of the Kinemacolor company, came here ahead of them and had made all the advance arrangements. A long term lease was taken on the old Revier studio at 4500 Sunset boulevard. This consists of three acres of ground with offices, stages, property rooms and other necessary buildings. It has been used by several different motion picture companies within the last two years.

As soon as the Kinemacolor forces took possession a large force of carpenters was put to work by W. H. Hoover, superintendent of plant. A scene dock 50 by 80 feet in dimensions, a new stage 40 by 80 feet, nineteen additional dressing rooms and a revolving stage 100 feet in diameter are now being built. Before Christmas there will be sufficient homes built on the grounds to accommodate all the employees and their families. One of the theories of the management is that the employees must be absolutely comfortable if they are to do the best work. The dressing rooms for example are being fitted up with hot and cold water, electric heaters, thick carpets and oak furniture.

Dave Miles, producing manager of the Kinemacolor Company of America, heads the company. He will act as head director, the other two being Frank Woods and Jack LeSaint, formerly of the Imp company. Both are on the ground. There are five cameras and cameramen and a complete developing plant. There are eight employees in the factory end, five property men and eight carpenters, besides the executive officials, the actors and Charles Dunzen the business manager—46 in all. The company brought along four horses, two dogs, two cats and three automobiles. The animals are all trained to act in the pictures.

Comedies, dramas, and high-brow Western features are to comprise the output from this plant. There will be nothing smaller than two-reel subjects although there may be releases of three or more reels if the stories are worth it. Each director will be looked to for approximately one release a week making six reels weekly. The company has been making film for several months.

Egan School Contest.

The prize photoplay contest of the Egan Dramatic School which closed October 15 brought in nearly 100 scripts which are now being reviewed and classified preparatory to the awarding of the prizes November 1. There are to be three prizes of $100, $75 and $50 respectively and another condition is that the company will pay $25 each for any manuscripts which, although not prize winners, are available for production.

Meanwhile the company has suspended operations at its plant on West Temple street. Frank C. Egan, head of the enterprise, says that this suspension is only temporary and that work will be resumed about November 1. L. A. Thompson, the scenic railroad man, who is looking after the details of disposing of the productions of the school, has gone East on a business trip for the concern and there will be no further productions until his return. A one reel drama called "A Ball of Yarn" was tried out at the Optic Theater one night this week for the benefit of Mr. Egan and the members of the company.

Bosworth "Doubles" In Legitimate.

Newspaper announcements to the effect that Hobart Bosworth had been engaged as leading man with the new stock company which will open an indefinite season of drama at the Lyceum theater in this city, beginning with "The Landslide" October 24, was responsible for a report that he had given up the position of leading man with the Edendale company of the Selig Polyscope Co. The rumor was baseless. His contract with the Lyceum stock company was signed with the consent of the Selig people. He will work in motion pictures at the Edendale studio during the day, except on matinee days, and will appear in the theater at night. After each evening's performance he will have the satisfaction of knowing that there is nothing to do until tomorrow.

Brevities.

Patrons of Horne's theater were again warned not to patronize the films inside this week. Billy Horne didn't like the program the General Film Co. sent him and he said so on the bulletin boards. For example: "An alleged Pathe comedy called 'Naughty Marietta,'" he announced. "You may laugh your fool head off at this, but we think it a rather dolorous attempt at comedy." In the middle of the week he got out an extra. "Sensational News Item," it read. "Broncho Billy, nursed by Max Aaronson, is reported to be sinking fast." Many stopped at the box office window to know what it meant.

Richard Willis and James Dayton, twin scenario editors of the Universal company, are enjoying the simple and primitive life. Their office was moved last week from the Hollywood plant to the new Universal studios at Oak Crest in the San Fernando valley. The nearest habitation is more than a mile away and within a stone's throw of their den is a deep canyon with a running stream. Ambitious photoplay writers cannot reach them without taking a five mile walk or hiring an auto. The offices they vacated in the Hollywood studio have made it possible to shift about so as to make space for a new projecting room and a substantial enlargement of the dark rooms. William Horsely has come back from New Jersey bringing with him a carload of laboratory apparatus. The plant is now equipped for making positives on a large scale.

M. M. Steele, who at the time of his death was an employee of the San Francisco branch of the Kinemacolor Company of America, committed suicide in Golden Gate Park, San Francisco, last week. He shot himself through the head with a revolver. The reason for his act is not known.

The Bison three reel production of the Custer Massacre proved to be a big card for the independent theaters last week and this week. It had received a great deal of favorable advertising in advance and it was one of the few features that had excited real interest before it arrived. On top of that the handling of the subject and the photography justified the promises that had been made for it, and the advertising that was given it by people who saw it at the first run houses made it even more profitable for the second run houses.

I have located the hardest-working, most intelligent picture pianist in Los Angeles. She is employed at the College Theater and I go there often not so much to see the pictures as to hear her play them, for she not only employs judgment and originality in making the music fit the scenes, but is an artist besides—has tone and temperament. I am told by the management that her name is Ruby Wallberg. POWELL.

TONY O'SULLIVAN RETURNS TO BIOGRAPH.

After an absence of three years, Anthony O'Sullivan, one of the famous original Biograph stock company, is going back to the scene of his former triumphs. He goes to the Biograph Company, Nov. 2, as a dramatic producer. He was formerly one of the company's best comedians. Mr. O'Sullivan for the past year has been the principal producer for the Reliance Co., having been advanced to that position from the stock company ranks. His success as a director has been noted in these columns many times, and his call to the Biograph Company will perhaps justify those assertions. While being a comedian of rare ability and long experience, Mr. O'Sullivan, as a director, has shown that he possesses the dramatic instinct to a remarkable degree, and has turned out some powerful dramatic subjects. These he has varied with his "Bedelia" comedy productions, appearing himself as "Bedelia" and directing the work. Incidentally, Tony will receive a far handsomer salary than he did in "them happy days gone by."

Advertising for Exhibitors

That Cigarette Scheme.

WE have received in the past couple of weeks all sorts of communications in regard to the offer of the American Tobacco Company in connection with a brand of cigarettes, each package of which carries a coupon with a cash value of one-half of one cent, and which are announced to be redeemable at motion picture theaters at their face value. At the same time the houses have been notified that the coupons will be redeemed at face plus 5 per cent. when sent in in lots of $5 or multiples.

The scheme has as many angles as the furniture in a dark bedroom when you have to walk the floor with the baby, but the consensus of opinion is decidedly against this combination of the motion picture and cigarette business. The cigarette, justly or unjustly, is not regarded with favor. It is but recently that the motion pictures have been able to emerge from the disfavor of the unthinking reformer. To these the new combination of the picture and the cigarette is but a fresh proof of the immorality of the picture shows, and the manager, for his own sake and the sake of the business in general, cannot well afford to have traffic with the cigarette offers.

There is absolutely no reason why the man who wants to smoke a cigarette should not do so. We have no use for cigarettes because we started on a pipe, and waited until a proper age before we started. The trouble with the cigarette is not that it is a cigarette, but that the stunted, stupid youngster is generally a cigarette smoker and owes his misfortune to the habit, and it requires no keen discernment to perceive that this motion picture scheme is not designed to draw the trade of the man who is able to judge for himself whether he wants a cigar or a cigarette. The picture scheme makes the cigarette more attractive to the small boy of eight to twelve or fourteen, who has no business using tobacco in any form.

Just Plain Business.

It is just a plain business policy to repudiate this deal. Post a sign that you do not accept cigarette coupons, and it will mean vastly more business to you than a hundred dollars' worth of coupons a month. You cannot afford to stand in with the tobacco company in making cigarettes more attractive to undeveloped boys. Unlike the tobacco company, you are dealing with the mothers of those boys, and you must make your choice between her support and the uncertain patronage of the nicotine-soaked child. It is not morality. It is not sentiment. It is plain, common-sense, every-day business judgment to array yourself on the side of the mothers and other right-thinking people, on the side of little girls and girls of larger growth, on the side of good business against bad.

Looking at it from another cold commercial point of view, you do not want the trade of these coupon-proffering boys. Many of them will come to your house anyhow. They will not visit the theater just because they have smoked up ten packs of cigarettes to get the five cents' worth of coupons. You don't want those sort of boys about your house. You'll probably get them and their nickels, but you do not want them, and it will pay, for the benefit of your other business, to keep them out. If you want their money you can get it in coin as easily as in coupons, and you'll be spared the trouble of handling the coupons. The announcement that you will not accept coupons will not hurt your business one penny. The announcement that you will accept the coupons will do you a real and permanent injury. Look beyond the glowing general statement that the coupons will help your business, and figure things out.

The cigarette company is not doing this to help out your business. IT IS DOING IT BECAUSE THE DEMAND FOR NICKELS FOR THE PICTURE SHOW IS THE ONE THING THAT MOST HURTS THE SALE OF CIGARETTES TO THE JUVENILE TRADE, AND THEY ARE USING YOU TO WIN THIS TRADE BACK TO THEM FROM YOU.

Are you going to help give the picture industry a setback just because a tobacco company asks you to? Think it over carefully; then go and paint this sign:

> Cigarette Coupons
> NOT
> Accepted for Admissions Here.

Then listen to what the mothers say.

Another Side.

There is another side to this business.

There are hundreds, thousands of young men who do not care for the photoplay theaters, but who will appreciate the value of the coupons as a bribe. One of the counts against the picture theater in the old dark days was the undoubted fact that a child could be coaxed to ruin through the picture houses more quickly than through the medium of candy or other treats. Even money was not equal to a theater ticket in the hands of the vicious. Will you restore that condition? Can you afford to?

As a coupon proposition the idea is not bad. Were the coupons packed in candy, chewing gum or similar wares the manager could afford to take the trouble to handle the coupons for the 5 per cent. allowance, though it is to be questioned if the percentage is sufficient to cover all expense, particularly in rush times, but no manager catering to women and children can possibly afford to assist in the physical wrecking of boys and the moral debasement of little girls. It is a bad business, no matter what your point of view. It won't make business, and most assuredly it will hurt it.

A Japanese Ticket.

There is a letter that goes with this cut of a Japanese theater ticket, but we were so careful to file it away that we cannot find it now, and so cannot acknowledge the courtesy of the friend who sent it on from Yokohama with a good story on himself. It seems that he was a new chum in the land where the tea comes from, and he was sweeping clean even for a new broom. Among the things he noted was the absence of strip tickets, and, being so far from home, he ordered a million of them, to be on the safe side. The thousand reels came in, and some one broke it gently to him that the Chinese and Japanese theaters get their tickets from the lumber yard. They procured one for him, and he sends it on to us. It has been photographed with a hand, that there may be a comparison of sizes. It is a bit of pine 10½ inches long by 2½ wide and half an inch thick, with two ideographs on each side, and is sold for nine sen, another sen being charged for taking care of the street shoes, which are not worn into the house. It is explained that the Orientals want something for their money, and that the strip tickets were tried and abandoned because it seemed too little to the purchaser, though he cheerfully lugs this small plank across the lobby, with the feeling that the show must be good because the ticket is so large.

We regret exceedingly that we are unable to credit the courtesy of our contributor.

He Still Lives.

We were wondering if William Barie, Jr., had been snatched from this sphere, when he broke his long silence to offer this suggestion:

> Using your "Advertising for Exhibitors" department as a guide, I thought I would try having the children write criticisms of the films, and the result was so astonishing one could hardly believe they could stir up so much interest in a contest of that nature, but at the end of the first week I had some 300 different stories on the pictures, and considering that we only change twice a week, I think that a mighty good showing.
> I am running the contest for a period of four weeks, and offering $5 in gold for the prize, and from the way each mail brings in more letters I can heartily endorse the scheme as being a good one, and praise the department for offering the idea.
> If all exhibitors would not only contribute to this department, but try those little schemes out and then tell how they "worked" for them, everybody could get away from the "old grind," and the patrons would undoubtedly take more interest.

Note that last paragraph particularly, please. If you try one of the schemes mentioned by another exhibitor, report on the results. Let us know if you put in any new twist to the wrinkle, and how that worked. If you try this scheme, be particular to explain to your patrons that criticism is not fault finding. A criticism may find no fault at all and still be a criticism, and it will not pay to encourage a spirit of fault-finding. We think that Mr. Barie covered this point in his contest.

Properly done, we think that the contest will aid the intelligent appreciation of the films, and in this way, as well as in direct interest, the scheme will more than pay.

The Vitagraph Monthly.

Did you notice the last issue of the Vitagraph bulletin? It is the first film publication issued by a manufacturer covering an entire month. It will now be possible to get your advance information four weeks ahead, instead of only two, and we extend our congratulations to Editor Spedon. We hope that others will fall into line.

Sounds Like China.

A letter from the Celestial Theater, Pekin, sounds more like China than Illinois, but that is where D. C. McClellan runs his house. We are glad to see his conscience pricked him, for he writes:

> A blush of shame suffuses my brow when I confess that this is the first time I have ever sent you a specimen of a publicity stunt, though I have profited many, many times by your department and I want to thank you for your sincere efforts to elevate the publicity end of the motion picture business.

Enclosed is an envelope in blue cloth-laid paper and a double sheet to match. The envelope is simply marked, "A Celestial Treat," and the sheet reads:

> You are cordially invited to attend any performance at the Celestial Theater. We are enclosing a slight courtesy, which we trust you will make use of, as we are desirous of demonstrating the superiority of our entertainment. It would be considered a favor if you would use the enclosed card at some performance between October twenty-first and twenty-seventh, inclusive. We regard the programs offered at the Celestial as worthy of your time, attention and patronage. As our specially invited guest we shall endeavor to make your visit a pleasant one in every possible way. D. C. McCLELLAN, Mgr.

Accompanying the invitation is a small card that reads:

MRS. JOHN DOE
Is the Invited Guest of the Management of the
CELESTIAL THEATER
At Any Performance from Oct. 21 to 27, Inclusive.

The name is filled in in ink. There is no "Saturday or Sunday excepted" or any of the other familiar legends. The invitation stands good any day for a week. It may be a little more costly, but in return there is a chance of getting more long-run business than would be possible with the restrictions. We like the way the card is phrased. An invitation is even better than a pass, and this line cannot be improved upon. As Mr. McClellan also conducts the Idylhour and Dreamland, the three houses having a combined capacity of 12,000, we hope that he will be a frequent visitor to this department, now that he has found his belated way in.

Doing Things Well.

Mr. McClellan seems to be willing to spend a little money on style when he starts out to do things right. The card, envelope and sheet probably represent a cost that would shock some managers, but he is out for good business, and he goes at it in the right way. If you went into a first class restaurant and the waiter came to serve you in his shirt sleeves, the chances are that you would go somewhere else, on the proposition that the coatless waiter was indicative of the place. In the same way, do not send your advertising out in its shirt sleeves. Put a coat on it and see that its shoes are shined and its nails manicured. If you want to make a good impression, start it out right. If you want the cheap business, use the cheap paper and hurried presswork, but if you want the best, ask for it in a way that shows you will know how to appreciate it when you get it.

Likes Street Work.

These Indians of the Paleface tribe are one of the schemes for advertising the Dreamland Theater, Modesto, Cal., and C. B. Johnson, the manager, writes that he finds that street advertising pays. Any kind of advertising pays that is properly done, and street work, if it possesses a touch of novelty, is a certain winner. This Indian stunt is a good one in a double sense. The get-up is novel and a kiddie will always attract attention. The idea is particularly good where some Indian subject is being advertised, but with any sort of release the novel stunt will attract attention, the great point being to take it off the street before it becomes common. Give most persons a chance to see it once, and then retire the idea for something else, even if you have to wait for an inspiration. Mr. Johnson uses the Universal program and there should be plenty of Indian releases when this advertising would be particularly appropriate. He writes that he would not think of trying to run his house without the Moving Picture World, and we do not see why anyone should try. The trouble with many exhibitors is that they do not use it enough. No matter what service you run you can get all the details from this paper and get it accurate. Do not merely subscribe for the paper. Use it.

We Tear.

S. A. Arnold, of the Lyric Theater, Mena, Ark., who has sent us many live wire ideas, sends in a throwaway that was used during the county fair week and asks that we tear it to pieces, which shows that he doesn't think it is just right himself. It is a sheet, 9 by 4½, printed in green ink with a border. Here is the essential copy:

The High Cost of Living

The truth about to-day told in Moving Pictures. A drama dealing with facts in which America of to-day is shown as it is. The picture shows the

Robber Trusts

as they are. How they rob the Consumer.

Do you know why you pay more for Clothing, Meat, Sugar, Coffee, Bread, etc.?

The answer will be shown in Moving Pictures TO-NIGHT.

Mr. Arnold thinks the title of the subject should have been in 24 point instead of 18. We'll see his 6-point raise and raise him twelve. The title should have been in 36 point at least, for if there is anything that will catch the rural eye it is the high cost of living.

The printer has used a 72 point "To-night" and a 60 point "Lyric" with the address in 18 point and "theater" in 24 point, but the big line of the whole thing is relegated to 18 point, the same as the street address. Catch them with the high cost of living in 36 point and they would find the address of the house were it in 6 point. The title should have been in three lines as bold as could be used across the page. A 60 point face would have been better yet with an 18 point "To-night," and the address in 10 point. The "do you know" could have been continued in 18 point, but "the truth" could have gone in 8 point leaded just as effectively, and the whole would have worked out about the same space as is now used. Mr. Arnold had the right idea, but the printer did not properly value his lines. Catch the eye with the big name in the largest possible type for a throwaway, and that will take care of the rest, so the name of the house is properly displayed.

Believes in Ink.

A. L. Stallings, of the Angelus, Spanish Fork, Utah, sends in an advertisement for criticism, and supplies his own comment. He writes:

> I enclose a copy of a local paper containing a half page ad. and would like your opinion of it. I myself think that there is too much descriptive matter for the size of the paper, but at any rate it got the business, and that's all we can expect it to do. In addition to the publication in the paper I had 650 sheets run off from the same type. We did a capacity business with "The French Spy," regardless of the fact that we had strong competition on both nights and in the face of an advanced price of admission.
> I use the local paper as much as possible, although with only one issue a week it is not safe to depend entirely on that. It would seem that the minds of the patrons must be refreshed every few days; that is, those who are not regular attendants—and it is these you are advertising for. The regulars keep themselves posted.
>
> I am also sending a program I used some time ago. They did not seem to take to it the way I thought they would. Cheaper advertising seems to appeal more strongly to them; at least we get better results, and when we get the results we should be satisfied.
>
> I have come to the conclusion that when I advertise I want to advertise my performance and let the public know what I have to give them, not what the butcher and grocer have for sale. It is the same way with slides. If they are run they should refer to the house, and not to other business concerns. I have tried the post card scheme with success, putting them out through the mails. I use the mails a great deal. It is expensive, but it is about the only way to get into the home and make people take notice.
> I have read about a slide that can be made on the typewriter. I sent for a gelatin outfit, but it was colored. Would like to know where these slides could be purchased.

Making Slides.

Mr. Stallings can get colorless as well as tinted gelatin sheets if he will ask for them. Possibly the company will exchange what is left of the colored for white. Most houses seem to prefer tint.

Any light white paper can be written upon and made translucent through the application of oil or varnish. In a pinch old kodak films can be cleaned off and used.

We quite agree with Mr. Stallings that the slide advertising some other business has no place in the theater. There are some houses where the interval between the reels is marked by a dreary exhibition of slides of everything from the doctor to the undertaker, and it doesn't pay. On the other hand, where a large program is printed there is no good reason why some trade advertisements should not be used to cut the cost. The trouble is that some programs give up the space to the foreign advertising at the expense of the house booming, and this defeats the end of the management. A reasonable number of advertisements should not prove objectionable.

The program cover of which Mr. Stallings speaks is a handsome three-color stock cover, and we cannot understand why they were not received with favor, unless, perhaps, the two-day program did not interest as would one running for a week.

Space and Filling.

Getting down to the advertisement, we agree with Mr. Stallings that he has too much type for the space. Apart from the name of the house a 36-point line is the largest he gets in a half-page advertisement. He got the business because he offered an attractive proposition, "The French Spy" and four other reels for 20 cents, but it would have been much better had he taken more of the space for the feature and less for the other reels. The special is in the center of three boxs and gets the 36-point line, the other titles getting in 24 point. Nothing stands out strongly, and in a larger and busier town the space would have been wasted.

Had we been laying the advertisement we would have thrown a title line clear across the sheet, using a 72-point extended letter. Then we would have played up the fact of seven reels more importantly than the other four titles, giving just a hint of each, together with a large title. Little more than this would have been needed. Seven thousand feet for 20 cents is more potent in its pull than the list of features in a Pathe Weekly. Most persons know the Pathe Weekly and at best this was an old issue. Play up your big points in the big type, and if you have room for more, all right. If you have not, let the story of the film wait until the audience gets to the theater. With Pathe, Vitagraph, Edison and Biograph on the same bill an excess of detail is not needed.

But Mr. Stallings knows what the matter is, and he knows, too, how to advertise, as other samples show. With a third of the space he gained twice the display for Pathe's "A Nation's Peril." He knows, too, how to get the ad. to carry reading notices. The papers are peppered with them.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Comet Not Buying.

JOE ROACH writes that at present Comet is not in the market for scripts, but that presently new companies will be formed, when there will probably be a demand for two or three a week. For the present lighten his labors by not sending anything in. It will do no good, and puts someone to the trouble of sending the script back or losing it.

Wants a Near-Author's Club.

Lucien G. Lambert suggests that there be formed a near-authors' club, with dues sufficiently heavy to permit the engagement of a critic to be at the disposal of the members.

We do not think that the plan is feasible. It is not criticism that helps the beginner so much as study and practice. The idea of the club it is our purpose to form on our return from the south is to help these beginners, those who have arrived giving assistance to those who are still struggling. The purely informal club will be better than a cumbersome organization with a paid secretary-critic and do a lot more real good.

What Happened to Jones.

There is a man by the name of Jones who writes to one of the manufacturing companies thusly:

Dear Sir"s:

I hearwith enclose two photoplay storys, composed by one of the writers who have signed contracts with me, agreeing to give me the exclusive privilege to sell their plots on commission basis.

Please give these storys your most careful consideration.

This is a new idea And I hope to be successful, with a few months I exspect to have a staft of at least fifty writers, Hopingy for a favorable reply I close. your"s truly,

And a man who cannot even spell the plural of story, who uses a period only at the end of a full paragraph, hopes to have a staff of fifty writers under exclusive contracts!

What happened to the erudite Jones was that he was advised that the company preferred to deal with the authors direct. Jones wasn't even told that his idea is exceedingly old. Sales bureaus are scattered all through the hamlets of Indiana and Ohio, to say nothing of New York, Chicago and Philadelphia. Get a list of studio addresses that will be sent you for a stamped and self-addressed envelope and you will have the same chance of selling your stuff as Jones and his numerous predecessors have—perhaps an even better chance.

Keep a Carbon.

Do you keep a carbon of every script you write, or are you one of those who talk regretfully of your "lost" scripts?

Keep a carbon, a good strong carbon, and you'll have no lost scripts. If the editor of the "Gumph" film company writes that he sent your story back three months ago, and you know you never got it, take the carbon out and copy it, but you can't copy it if the copy is not legible.

Don't engage in the interesting experiment of seeing how many carbons you can make from one sheet of carbon paper. Carbon paper costs two or three cents a sheet, but if you can make fifteen clean impressions from a sheet, each impression costs but the fifth of a cent, and is worth it. Keep carbons and keep them in an orderly and systematic manner. Keep them until your accepted story has been produced. It has happened more than once that an original script gets lost after purchase. If you are asked for a carbon and must confess that you have made none, the editor is apt to remember the next time one of your scripts comes in that you cannot help him out of a hole if he gets in one.

More than that, lots of stories have been paid for after production on the strength of the carbon copy as evidence of ownership. That may happen to you tomorrow. Have you the carbon?

Tag Up the Envelope.

A. Van Buren Powell read of the lady who got someone else's script back in one of her own envelopes from she didn't know where. Then he sat down and wrote in the suggestion that the author write on the return envelope "From," and the name and address of the company to which it was sent. That's a good idea, but a better one yet is to write inside the envelope the name or number of the story sent. This is almost necessary where more than one script is sent the same company within a short period.

It is convenient to give a script a number as well as a name. It is easier to handle and fully as explanatory. One card system carries the number on the card, and the cards are filed by number except when they are in the hands of some editor. Keeping the carbons in numerical order makes them easier to find, since you handle the cards to find the title and turn straight to the number. If you have from twenty to thirty stories out, as a professional should have, some such system as this is imperative.

When you get stuck.

Ever get stuck with a story that gets hung up in the middle and sags at both ends? Here is part of a recent letter:

> Then, too, I frequently get stuck. I get a fine idea, which works out for ten or twelve scenes and then comes a place where, to save my soul, I can't get it right or write a scene to fit. I can write the end, but the middle seems to be the hard place; is every one afflicted this way?

It is something that is liable to happen to anyone now and then and to some very often. The answer is that the ends are not mates or it's the wrong middle. If you have your start and your climax properly matched up the action in between should be clear and well marked in your mind, but if you start with one idea and write toward the wrong conclusion and the middle runs right you are liable to find that your story stops because you cannot make the middle match the climax. The best thing to do in a case like this is to forget the projected ending and let the action run straight to the climax that it suggests. Given a start and a finish what comes between should be suggested by one end or the other. When it does not run straight you've made the wrong start for the finish or you have the wrong finish for the start. Do not try to force the middle action toward the decreed finish, but let the action run on to its own conclusion and sometimes you will find that you have a better finish than you originally planned. It is a good plan to have some end in view and work toward that end, but you cannot distort the run of action to fit a predetermined climax if you have not selected the proper climax. You never can tell what you are going to have until the story's end and sometimes you'll stop right in the middle of a story because there seems to be no end. You can fight your plot if you feel so inclined, but the better plan is to lay it aside and write something else and some day you'll find the proper ending for that good start and finish it off.

If you want to fight with it go at it right. Don't grow angry and wrestle all over the mat. Argue with it. Ask it where it wants to go and why it wants to go there. Offer some other possible destinations and some explanation as to why that particular destination should be as good. Be more than half way willing to arbitrate and in the end you'll have some sort of a story. It may not be a very good story, but it may be susceptible of improvement. It's a poor plan to go to your machine determined to write one particular story and no other. Get a start and some idea of a finish and work toward that end, or, better still, do not go to the machine until you have the details so well worked out that you can sit down and write it straight through because you have already written it in your head.

Doesn't Get the Point.

A California correspondent, apparently a newspaper woman, takes issue with us on a recent suggestion that it was best that the novice stick to familiar themes until the pinfeathers gave place to pinions. She writes:

> I am a native of Southern Indiana, but have spent the last eleven years in San Jose and upon this coast, during which time I have studied and written about the West, not as it was in the beginning, but as it is to-day and was a few years since. I have boarded for months at a time upon different ranches, have witnessed fruit handling, know the difficulties encountered with the coming of "coolie labor," have studied social conditions in Western cities, and have tried to tell my stories truthfully, but to date have had but one Western scenario accepted and in that, all that was truly Western was cut out and other scenes substituted. There are companies in Los Angeles making Western pictures, but they hang to the pioneer days, and to Western people generally these are nauseating to say the least.
> A cowboy riding through the streets of San Jose to-day with his conspicuous attire is just as much a novelty to the small boy as he is in the picture. Once in about two years something happens to bring in the use of a posse. The wild-west shows that exhibit in large circus tents in the East are just as well patronized here in San Jose as there, for none but pioneers have witnessed such escapades in real life; however, they are not patronized by the better class of people.

We do not think that this correspondent read our remarks with her brain, but merely with her eyes. She goes on to point out that there are lots of spots outside of California that would look as well in pictures, and winds up with "so it does not necessarily follow that because Westerners do not write of the stories close at hand, that they can not know something of other parts of the world."

That is exactly and precisely what we said. We suggested that the novices start writing of home things and as experience came broaden their field until they could write of other parts of the world, just as this writer contends. But until you can write of other parts of the world, write of that part of the world you know something about. The other day we received from a beginner in the country a story of a broker. We have several relatives in Wall Street and we know something of the stock game and how brokers act. But this story was the sort of story that someone would write whose experience with the market was limited to reading Tom Lawson's stuff in the magazines. He might have written a good story of his home town, but he came to town in imagination and his imagination was dead wrong.

Here is a woman who goes to California and makes a study of the West of to-day. She disdains to learn of the old, romantic pioneer days. She studies the somewhat unpicturesque modern West and grows angry because the manufacturers will not make pictures of this phase when they have the richer color and free life of earlier times. She writes what she wants to write rather than what she knows the editors want her to write, and then she wonders why she does not sell.

The Los Angeles producers are not making pictures to please her and those other "better class people" who stay away from Wild West Shows when they come to town. They are making pictures for the whole world, and two hundred prints sold abroad loom larger on the books than the three or four prints sold to the California exchanges.

Editors do not want stories of fruit gathering. They can get the industrials themselves. They do not want coolie labor problems unless they are made into gripping stories. The old West is more picturesque. It sells better in the world market. They make what sells and they make it well, and the stories of pioneer days do not hurt the feelings of the real Californian who is proud of being a Native Son. They hurt the feelings of the imported citizens from the Middle West and elsewhere. And in the meantime this writer keeps on writing of the West to-day and the people back East keep writing as well as they can of the West of old and they sell because they meet the market and take the opportunity from the people who might write more accurately of the old West because thy are on the ground.

If you want to sell stories, write the sort of stories that will sell and do not try to educate the editors. If you want to write merely to please yourself and your personal friends, do not be surprised if you make few sales.

And we did not say, in the first place, that Californians must write only of California. We said the trained writer could go anywhere with the aid of books of travel, but that until you know something of other lands it is better to write of familiar topics and gradually widen the field. The properly trained writer should be able to write of East or West and this trick will come to all in time, but until it does come, through practice, stick to home stuff and like the ripple that follows the stone broaden until you cover the whole pool and reach from shore to shore.

Something to Laugh At.

Two of the correspondence schools are using testimonials written by pupils before they discovered just how little they had been given for their money. Inquirers to these two persons are told the truth and advised to keep clear. It's a little tough on the schools, but it has been harder on the pupils.

Listen to This.

We've just come across the cutest swindle yet. Have you?

A "service association" in Chicago wants to get twenty-five good photoplay writers. They are in "dire need" of them, in fact. The dire-est sort of need, apparently. They are spending a lot of money to coax in some writers, 25—count 'em—25 who will earn from $200 to $250 monthly, commencing December 1st. IF the service association hasn't moved so far by then that even the police and post office inspectors can't find them. They are sending out a sheet (most appropriately a deep yellow) in which they make plain their needs. Just incidentally you must write the prize-winning story in a certain form, and this form—and a book on photoplay—will be sent you for one dollar. We are almost willing to bet that the form promised is that dear old Mother Love that has been done to death though as a sample photoplay it is not a success since it carries neither leader or inserted matter. It is worse than useless.

If you have been one of those who have fallen for this glittering, glamorous offer, count your dollar as one long dead. You'll never see it again. If you have been tempted and did not fall, rejoice and be exceeding glad. In any event write this down.

No prize contest other than one conducted by a reputable company having an outlet through one of the three distributing channels can be other than a fraud.

Any person who promises a novice (let alone 25 of them) an income of $200 a month is a liar. There are not 25 persons in the United States who are getting that much a month unless they are hired by some company.

Writing Two-Part Stories.

Now that there is a growing demand for two-part stories, a few hints may prove helpful. Select a strong theme, one that will permit you to use plenty of action. Few polite dramas will hold the interest through two parts, so turn in preference to the rugged themes of outdoor life. Develop your action with more care for detail than you can show in a one-part story, but developing detail does not mean to run a lot of padding. If you've a good story you can run into two parts and still have it all solid meat, but where you condense for a short story take the time to give ample development. Run from fifty to seventy scenes according to the length of action and about halfway through bring events to a strong, tense situation that will leave the spectator gasping and wanting more. The part of a picture is like the act of a play. The curtain should not fall on a quiet scene nor yet one that suggests that the story is over. Bring everything to a boil and just as it seems about to bubble over cut the scene and leave the solution of the matter to the next part.

Practise varies as to whether the script should be in one or two parts, but the better plan is to run it as a whole, numbering the scenes consecutively throughout and marking the point where it is suggested that the first part should end. One complete synopsis should cover the entire story.

But before you write two-part stories study them on the screen and see just how they are handled. There are lots of little points that you can get only from actual observation.

As to the market; almost any company will make a two-reel subject if the theme be strong enough, but it must be an unusual story to tempt the management.

Keep Going.

The other day we had a letter from a photoplay writer who told us that she had been writing for two years in which time she had done five scripts. Of these, two were sold, two had become lost and one was apparently an undesirable. And that same afternoon came a man who told us that nine weeks ago he bought a book on technique since when he had written ten scripts of which four had sold, a fifth being held for consideration, while the others were going the rounds.

In a word the man had accomplished in nine weeks double what the other had done in two years and he had done it by sticking at it. In the same nine weeks a professional writer did thirty-three scripts and sold eighteen of them for $450.

It is to be presumed that the professional standard at which the novices aim. The man who wrote a little more than one a week will no doubt find his place among the regulars because he keeps at it and learns from his disappointments. The woman who writes two and a half scripts a year never will get anywhere in particular because she lacks application.

There is only one way to become a practised writer and that is through constant practise backed up by study. Every time you write a story you are one step nearer the professional grade. Each time you write a story it will come a little easier. If you write a story and wait until it sells you never will get anywhere, because each time you start to write a story it comes as hard as the first one did. Write and keep on writing until writing becomes a habit and then work and keep on working until the habit becomes the habit of writing good stuff instead of stuff that varies. You can't write a good story every day, but if you write a story every day you're bound to write some good ones. Try it, but don't make writing a story a semi-yearly event and expect to succeed.

Do You Live in New Haven?

If you live in New Haven and write photoplays we know a man in Yale who wants someone to talk photoplays with.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of studio addresses, kept up-to-date, will be sent if a stamped and addressed return envelope accompanies the request.

H. C. W.—Dell Henderson is with the Biograph.

MARBLEHEAD.—The Masko Film Company makes special productions and has no regular stock organization, for which reason names are not available. The Kalem production is a photoplay, of course, though it is hinted that there is a foundation of fact. A little thought will make it plain that it would be impossible to have a camera handy to cover all the unforeseen happenings of a story taken from real life at the time it occurred. Sorry we cannot give you the Biograph names, but they are newcomers.

E. J. M.—You seem to give too short a time to the company. Scripts liable to be accepted always remain longer in the studio than those that are not. Correspond with the company before issuing a fresh copy. Register the letter. We have already announced the postponement of the formation of the Inquest Club.

G. H. H.—You have Bert Hendler correctly placed in the parts you mention. Alfred Paget was the convict in "A Beast at Bay." Frank Oppermann was the claim jumper in "Man's Lust for Gold." Don't know for certain, but think Miss Pickford has brown hair. Rex does not give casts.

M. L. P.—Glad the tip brought about a sale. James Cruze was Vaughn in the Thanhouser "Called Back."

S. A. M.—S. M. Spedon, the Vitagraph chief publicity man offers this solution as to the two wrongs in "The Red Barrier". She marries the wrong man and throws down the right one. Then the right one kills the wrong one in a duel. Get it?

J. D. P.—The address of the Gaumont Company is in the advertising pages each week. They have no company here and the names of their French company are not known.

G. H. H.—We fail to see that certain speeches from a drama are essential to a play that does not duplicate the plot, but if you merely desire to make a brief extract for leader put the quotation marks around it. Do not pick out long speeches.

V. G. S.—The two girls in "The Unseen Enemy" are not known to our identifier. Miss Flo LaBadie was Barbara in Thanhouser's "East Lynne." Miss Pickford has joined the Belasco forces. Miss Mae Marsh replaces her. Several persons have played opposite Mr. Blackwell since Miss Joyce came East. Miss Lillian Christy seems to play more often than the others. Who plays opposite Miss Joyce is a more difficult question. In "Mary in Stageland," Miss Bliss Milford was the chorus girl.

A. B.—Miss Claire McDowell was the mother and Gladys Egan the child in "In the North Woods." Mack Sennet and Miss Mabel Normand were the father and daughter in "What the Doctor Ordered." This department is for regular readers, not for those who send the money for the particular issue in which the answer appears.

DOROTHY R.—Miss Jean Gale was Beth in Lubin's "The Puppet's Hour." Miss Pickford was Little Stranger in "A Pueblo Legend." See reply to V. G. S. Miss Pickford, Miss Claire McDowell and Miss Dorothy Bernard were the three women in "The Female of the Species." In Lubin's "A Cure for Jealousy," Arthur Johnson and Miss Ormi Hawley were the husband and wife and Harry C. Myers the friend.

J. S. M.—The five hundred word synopsis will not be read in some studios. It will in others. You do not need the half of five hundred words if you frame your synopsis properly. The Lubin and Kalem Companies are working in the South. Better send the outdoor comedy to some Los Angeles company. Addresses will be sent if you send a stamped envelope. Comedies are in good demand if they are comedies of action and not merely scripts that sound funny when you read them. It is well to keep your plot of action brief, but you can have the space you require for the telling of the story. The gauge is length of film not number of words. You seem to be about right with 25 scenes. The companies you mention are not buying much outside stuff. Salaries are not printed.

G. F. M.—That Edison is too old—about three years. We would not swear to it, but we think it was Miss Rolinda Bainbridge.

A. L. R.—The company you mention seems to be getting into pretty deep water and we understand that the Post Office Inspectors are working on the case because of the numerous complaints that money has been received for which no effort seems to be made to give any return. The general scheme is within the limits of the postal law, but the company appears to have rendered itself liable under serious charges. Write the Chief Post Office Inspector, Washington, D. C., that your complaint may be added to the others. It is advisable to tell him the name of the publication in which you saw the advertisement. They seem to have no editor for their magazine and we believe that it did not come out last month.

MOBILE.—Miss Clara Williams and Edgar Jones had the leads in "Red Saunder's Sacrifice." In "The Uprising," Mary was Miss Mary E. Ryan and Bob was Robyn Adair. We have written for the Pathe information and will reply if they can give us the names.

TOM.—It seems to be useless to ask for information since the formation of the Universal Company. Sorry.

F. M. E.—We lack the information on the first Biograph. The others are printed above or have been told very recently. In "The Reconstructed Rebel," Dick Winston was Al. E. Garcia.

Director Haddock, of the Eclair Company, is having his own troubles with the leopard that has recently been added to Eclair stock. The director did a lively piece of ladder climbing to the roof of the studio one day last week. By the way, this leopard, together with a tiger, forms the nucleus of the first moving picture menagerie in the metropolitan section.

Comments on the Films

Licensed

"THE OLYMPIC GAMES AT STOCKHOLM" (Pathe).—This special film needs no comment other than the statement that it is very well photographed. Here surely is a safe feature if there ever was one.

"JIM'S PARTNER" (Pathe), October 31.—Retelling old stories in new pictures is commendable, from both artistic and commercial viewpoints. when the producer, learning from former failures of himself and of others, can redevelop the old situation and make it more convincing and human. This very good offering has, at the same time, very little that is new in its situation and much that is both fresh and pleasing in the style with which it is handled. The miner's wife, tired of seemingly loveless monotony, is eloping with her husband's partner, when she tumbles over an embankment and is hurt. Her husband finds her, carries her home and goes for a doctor. In the meantime she tries to light a candle and sets the house on fire. Her husband comes back just in time to rescue her. The fire scenes are excellent; the fall scenes also are good.

"THE FISHERMAN'S LUCK" (Essanay), October 31.—Howard Missimer plays the fisherman summer boarder, a rather farcical father with a daughter. John Steppling plays an actor also staying at the hotel, and who can catch fish. Dolores Cassinelli plays Missimer's daughter, with whom Steppling is in love. Missimer gets "in deep" over his (?) catch of fish, and Eleanor Blanchard tattles, which leaves Steppling's scheme high and dry. Howard Missimer's work makes the picture; he enjoys his work, and spectators enjoy looking at it.

"WRONGLY ACCUSED" (Melies), October 31.—There is one distinctly new character in this picture, one that brings in a new situation—he is the dope fiend. As a whole, the story, with nothing else that is new, has been freshly produced. With every foot that is unreeled the interest deepens, because the action is absolutely clear and plain and the acting, always intelligent, is now and then extremely good.

"PARSON JAMES" (Lubin), October 29.—A simple story without depth of any kind, but made effective by its pleasing presentation. It tells of a little girl, left as a baby with a priest, who grows up and is shown her mother's grave. This mother was a worthless woman and dies just before the girl comes home to her foster father from the convent.

"COPPER MINES AT BINGHAM, UTAH" (Edison), October 30.—This picture gives a very clear idea of a mining town tucked away between mountain ranges. Bingham is six miles long and sixty feet wide, and these very well photographed views will be found unusually interesting.

"A SUFFRAGETTE IN SPITE OF HIMSELF" (Edison), October 30.—A picture taken in London from a scenario by Bannister Merwin, and a thoroughly amusing comedy. Mark MacDermott is fine as an irascible, anti-suffrage English gentleman who doesn't know he has "Votes for Women" pinned on his coat. Miriam Nesbitt makes an excellent Englishwoman, and although Ethel Browning is not at all convincing as a maid, she adds a good deal to the comedy. A very good offering.

"A RACE FOR HONOR" (Eclipse), October 30.—An intelligently produced picture. The story, which is not probable, is kept from intruding that fact again and again on the spectator. We don't by any means imply that this is unusual in Eclipse pictures, for it isn't. But we have seen more than one picture this week with stories behind them as good and better than this that seemed handled to please the producer, and not the spectator, and we want to say that we see the difference. The title of the picture is not apt; it suggests something different from the story. The father of the heroine has stolen a wallet and has made his employe, a young mechanical engineer, seem guilty. The girl loves the young man and she and he follow the older man, who is escaping, and persuade him to come back. This gives an automobile chase—the "race for honor." It has some very pretty scenes and will please.

"THE STRANGE STORY OF ELSIE MASON" (Kalem), October 30.—Elsie's story is indeed strange, but that is greatly in its favor. It is not only pleasingly novel, but prettily told by lovely scenes and makes an offering that can be relied on to entertain all kinds of people. Elsie Mason, in the early scenes, is a charming little maid of about two years; in later scenes Alice Joyce takes the part—a grown-up Elsie. The child is out in the early morning, all by herself, and a rich woman, who finds her and takes a great fancy to her, practically kidnaps her. Lucille Young plays this rich woman. Tom Moore plays a nephew of this woman, who, years later, falls in love with Elsie. Her foster mother dies before the wedding, and the girl learns of her true origin. She writes to Tom, breaking the engagement, and goes to her real mother. Like Lady Clara Vere de Vere, but in a very modern and very pleasing fashion, Tom finds her. It is a good offering.

"A MAMMA WANTED" (Pathe), October 30.—A picture made to please spectators. It is a light-hearted, rollicking love story in comedy vein and with a good deal of humanity. The trouble with much of the love making in moving pictures, both in serious and comedy love stories, is its inhuman abnormality; it makes us bitter against ourselves and our kind. The temptation to be emphatic leads producers who keep the theater always in mind, into all kinds of foolishness. The producer of this story did not supinely follow stale and artificial suggestions. He plainly shows the courage of his own observations of life; consequently he pleases us with something fresh as well as truthful. We refer solely to the love story, for he has added a very farcical scene which, although it pleased the house greatly, as did the whole story, we feel did not add to the effect of the picture as a whole. We believe that the love story alone with those two most engaging kids and the shop girl's three girl friends would have been quite ample to fill a whole reel and make a fine picture. As it is, it is a very good offering.

"HER BITTER LESSON" (Selig), October 31.—A picture adapted from M. E. Braddon's novel, "Aurora Floyd." The novelist or story teller has plenty of chance for explanation, and so can make a really unconvincing situation seem plausible, while a moving picture producer, unless he uses the greatest care and art, must set it right out before us and leave it in all its nakedness. It very often happens that a picture made from any but a great novel with a truly human and perfectly natural situation seems weak because of this and the fact that things are forced into abnormally speedy sequence; they seem abrupt. This picture suffers a good deal from these defects. The situation is possible, but both it and its development fail to convince unless we spread it out in our minds, make every allowance for the time element, and see in an instant's acting the symbol for a heart struggle that really lasted days. Nevertheless it interests. The plot is good, and the scenes and players are very pleasing. Especially pleasing is Adrienne Kroel, as Aurora. Mr. Hardee Kirkland produced it, and deserves credit.

"POET AND PEASANT" (Vitagraph), October 31.—A modern story of France, telling the love of a beautiful peasant girl for a poet who left her to die of a broken heart. There is a hunchback in the village hopelessly in love with the girl, and pictured as watching her fading away in inner torment which he does not try to conceal. Mr. H. L. Barry plays the poet; Clara Kimball Young, the peasant girl. Her grace and beauty add much to the picture. Charles Eldridge plays the father, and James Young, the hunchback. Mr. Young has done excellent work, but is weak in this role. The scenario is by W. L. Tremayne, and the producer is W. V. Ranous, who has been remarkably successful in giving it an old world atmosphere.

"A HEART IN RAGS" (Selig), October 30.—A picture dealing with the good-hearted but ragged hobo who befriends a little girl and is suspected of kidnapping her. It shows how the tramp came to know who the child was, how she fell asleep in an open box car, the search of the parents, and the arrest of the tramp, with the final explanation. The author, Basil D. Wood, doesn't deserve much credit. It was produced by Henry McRae, who has handled his material intelligently and made it pleasing. Its worst fault is padding; there was too much box car in it, too much of the railroad journey. Baby Hazelet plays the child; Madge Carson, the mother; Colin Reid, the father; Pat Carson, the tramp; Frank Decamp and T. J. Commerford, two pals of the tramp; T. Flynn, the telegraph operator, and Tom Johnson, a farmer.

"THE HEAVENLY VOICE" (Lubin), Oct. 31.—Arthur Johnson here gives us a comedy with several laughs. He is supported, and well supported, by Miss Briscoe, Charles Brandt and Madge Orlamond.

"A TRAGEDY AT THE COURT OF MILAN" (C. G. P. C.), Nov. 1.—A story of court intrigue, put on in impressive manner, but at times heavy, inclined to be ponderous. The scenes are nearly all of the studio, yet there are some very fine settings of castle and courtyard.

"HIS WEDDING EVE" (Selig), Nov. 1.—A comedy in which Thomas Santschi, dressed for his wedding, takes an airing just before the hour of the ceremony. He collides with a nurse girl, portrayed by Betty Harte. The girl suffers a sprained ankle and is taken to a hospital, leaving in the bridegroom's arms the infant that had been in her charge. The bridegroom has much trouble endeavoring to get rid of his "elephant," finally landing in the station house. There was much distress at the bride's home, but matters were finally straightened out. There was an obvious discrepancy in the scenario, in that the bridegroom might have straightened out matters had he telephoned the hospital. However, the film makes fun.

"THE MUSKETEERS OF PIG ALLEY" (Biograph), Oct. 31.—An underworld story which will remind many who see it of some recent happenings in New York City. There are gangs and gang feuds. The whole production is handled with much care, and will make a strong release.

"PAT THE SOOTHSAYER" (Kalem), Nov. 1.—Mr. and Mrs. Hogan will draw out a few laughs from a reserved audience. Pat leaves home and gets a job as a palmist. Mrs. Hogan consults the new Professor Bunko and in short order discovers the imposition.

"THE AMERICAN RHINE" (Kalem), Nov. 1.—On the same reel as the foregoing are these views, most of which were taken on a steamer trip between New York City and Albany. Among the pictures are many of Revolutionary interest.

"A BABY'S SHOE" (Edison), Nov. 1.—There are three corners in this drama; they are Walter Edwin, Gertrude McCoy and Robert Brower. In the last 300 feet of the film there are several "punches," and they are all stiff. There are strong situations, the sort that are realized by an uncomfortable feeling in the throat and eyes.

"THE FAMILY NEXT DOOR" (Lubin), Nov. 2.—A comedy of characters with a taste that is quite new. The freshness, which is one of its most marked characteristics, comes mostly from the producer's playful fancy and his large use of facial expression. In the love story, meant only as a frame for the comedy, there is nothing new whatever. The producer is a little weak in his love scenes and had too many cowgirls in the cast. But behind the picture there is very plainly an individual and fresh way of looking at things. The audience plainly liked the offering. It is a good laugh maker.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 45" (Nov. 2).—Some days ago a steamer the "Empress of India" rammed and sank a ship named the "Helvetia." A camera man was fortunately on the spot and got a picture of it. The "Helvetia" was a big steamer and we see her sink. This sensational item is, of course, a big thing. Nearly all the items are good.

"HEREDITY" (Biograph), Nov. 4.—A dramatic story of a half-breed lad, son of a squaw-man who was a trapper. Always near the Indians, he was more red than white, especially as his father was not the man to bring him up wisely. He finally goes back to his mother's tribe. The picture is not without substantial humanity; but seems to have less than is usual in offerings of this make and its subject is not so pertinent and therefore not so interesting. The photography is a little weak and the picture, while clear, lacks the picturesque beauty of much Biograph work. Yet, as an Indian picture, it surely is, when compared with all the pictures, a very good offering.

"MOUNTAIN DEW" (Kalem), Nov. 4.—The usual love story with the revenue man and the moonshiner's daughter and in which the former helps his sweetheart's father. Carlyle Blackwell and Lillian Christy play the leads. The leading lady is competent and gives some freshness to the picture.

"AN OFFICIAL APPOINTMENT" (Vitagraph), Nov. 4.—Miss Catherine Carr has given us a decidedly worth while picture in this story, taken from the fringes of official life in Washington, D. C. Mr. Charles Kent produced it and plays the leading role, a Kentucky colonel, not unlike the famous "Colonel Carter," who, with his old darkie servant (Harold Wilson), has waited long and vainly for an appointment. A fake appointment is sent to him by some flippant clerks and the mortification is a cruel blow. The official appointment is soon brought by the secretary's daughter; but he sits dead in his arm chair. Surely here is a popular picture, one whose success is assured. It is a desirable offering. Mr. Tefft Johnson plays the secretary; Mrs. B. F. Clinton, a house keeper, and Miss Norma Talmadge the secretary's daughter.

"IN THE GARDEN FAIR" (Vitagraph), Nov. 2.—A picture in which two little children elope. Some weeks ago, the Vitagraph company produced a very sweet and poetic picture with this same theme; but there is a bit too much actual nursery atmosphere in this picture to let it please wholly. It doesn't convince and, although there was some laughter, it is not a strong success. It is too unnatural. Mrs. Breuil wrote the scenario, which was produced by Fred Thomson. Robert Gaillord plays a widower who lives with his little boy on the opposite side of a garden wall from a widow, played by Rose Tapley, and her little girl, Helen Costello.

"FIXING A FLIRT" (Lubin), Nov. 1.—A young man predisposed to flirtation with nearly every girl he sees is "fixed" good and plenty. One of seven girls receives a letter inviting her to dinner. She accepts. As the two are seated in a restaurant two of the girls join them, and are invited to sit down. When the last of the party have been fed the flirt is broke. The restaurant man takes his watch, stick and several other articles for security. As the party leaves the restaurant, all bid the young man good-bye. To make the discomfiture complete the man's landlady shuts him out of his home. It is fair comedy.

"THE MOVING FINGER" (Essanay), Nov. 1.—Were it not for Lily Branscombe's truly remarkable picturing of the same character as both in youth and in disreputable age, there would be little to commend in this offering. Harry Cashman and Frank Dayton also play their parts well, especially the former; but the action that is pictured isn't fair to intelligence. It is a sermon on the results of poor men's wives running away to enjoy the luxuries of sin for a season.

"BOBBY'S DREAM" (Edison), Nov. 2.—A child's pirate dream that will entertain children in one way and grown-up people in another, as setting forth the exaggeration natural in a child's dream.

"FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICE" (Edison), Nov. 2.—In comedies, the audience's laughter is the producer's justification. The author of the very slight farce deserves credit for knowing the picture-making possibilities of the Edison studio. It is truly funny only because it is as silly as possible, and its idiocy makes it a good offering. It certainly is silly.

"THE SKINFLINT" (Kalem), Nov. 2.—A picture with a homely story of village life. The skinflint is rich and refuses aid to his needy sister, a widow; but later, in misfortune, he is cared for by the sister and relents. The widow has a daughter who provides, in the picture, the fringes of a love story. There also are other village characters who are interesting in themselves and help along the story. Wm. H. West plays the skinflint and Jane Wolff, the widow, and both are worthy of high praise. Lillian Christy plays the girl. She passes through two or three scenes alone; but her whole attitude and facial expression awaken the deepest interest, and add much by suggestion to the picture. Carlyle Blackwell plays the girl's lover.

"ANNE BOLEYN" (C. G. P. C.), Nov. 5.—A dramatization of the plotting of Jane Seymour against Anne Boleyn. The hand-colored picture will arouse interest for its historic and dramatic value. The characterization of Anne was well done by a woman of queenly figure and splendid talent.

"CHAINS" (Essanay), Nov. 5.—Ruth Stonehouse gives us a strong portrayal. An engaged woman marries a man who has just been sentenced to fifteen years in prison as a result of a brawl in which crime was committed. As the minister pronounces the two man and wife the husband is led away to jail. The woman is unable to endure the snubs of her friends and goes to the city seeking employment. She finds it in the office of a man who falls in love with her and tells her so. She is in love with him. When she visits her husband in jail she finds a brute. Her employer persists in his suit. Then she confesses all that has gone before. The employer even then wants her to go away with him, but she tells him it is not to be. There will be many who will say this is a false conception of a woman's duty to herself and to the man she really loves. They will say that she should have divorced the convict. At all events, "Chains" is a story that will stir the heart. Miss Stonehouse's interpretation of the fight of the wife between love and her sense of right was splendidly done. Mr. Bushman took the role of the employer. His work was of just the character we always expect from him—the best.

"THE VOICE OF WARNING" (Selig), Nov. 4.—Little Reine Greenwood has much to do in this story of pathos, and she acquits herself with credit. It seems unbelievable that a child, asking assistance on the street for a sick mother, should be refused by nine persons in succession.

"THE FACE OR THE VOICE" (Vitagraph), Nov. 5.—A story that is simple, yet owing to the superb acting of Miss Turner will reach the heart. Her portrayal of the sister who surrenders the man she loves, and even aides in deceiving that man, through sisterly affection, is splendidly done.

"JUAN AND JUANITA" (Lubin), Nov. 4.—There is in this picture a thrilling hold-up—a bit different from the usual, and exceedingly well done. It is a railroad story, with a tale of love running through it.

"A ROMANCE OF THE RAILS" (Edison), Nov. 5.—A good story, and well played by George Lessey, Bessie Learn and William West. There is a thrilling rescue of a man with a broken leg from in front of a moving train. Mr. Lessey, as the rescuer, picks up Mr. West on a trestle and runs with him, just missing being struck. Had the burden-carrier fallen it would have been a different story. But this is merely an incident in an interesting film.

"THE FIRST GLASS" (Powers), November 8.—More effectively than most pictures, with a clearly marked out purpose, this temperance story is pictured as told by an old woman in a saloon restaurant to a young girl. It is the story of her experiences and downfall, and as though to keep it anchored to its purpose, the woman's narrative is interrupted occasionally by the first scene, which shows her telling her story. This frank admission of the story's purpose makes it very effective. There is no evidence of hurried or sloppy work in the handling. The acting (Florence Barker acts the woman's story) of all the cast is natural and convincing. Many of the scenes, taken by themselves, are fine. It is just the kind of picture to help a temperance lecturer, for it is natural, simple and human. It will also give the general public good entertainment at a show for these very reasons.

"SISTERS" (Victor), November 8.—Taken by itself, there is not a very substantial situation behind this picture, but it gives Florence Lawrence a vehicle for one of her characterizations. The story begins slowly. It is of two sisters taken to an orphanage; nor did the "empty cradle" scene help any. The story really begins when the two are adopted by different families. Years pass; they have married and lost track of each other. The one who is Florence Lawrence has married a fireman, Owen Moore. This fireman, in the course of his duties, makes a rescue of the other sister, whom he thinks is his wife. She dies of heart disease in his arms. He comes home to his apartment, and his wife is hiding; she has a little present and wants to surprise him. He believes that it was really his wife, and is about to kill himself when she enters.

"ON SECRET SERVICE" (Kay-Bee), Nov. 1.—In two reels is this stirring military play. The feature is a spectacular battle scene, which is unusually well staged. One of the incidents is an explosion in which a caisson is thrown high in the air. A love story runs through the picture.

"FOILING A FORTUNE HUNTER" (Eclair), November 7.—The love story of an American heiress. She has quarreled with her American lover and is being courted by a count (?). Her father cleverly finds that the count's present position is keeping bar, and that he was once in prison. An elopement has been arranged. Father lets this go ahead, but plans to foil the count at the end. There is well-sustained dramatic suspense, good acting and a smoothly-told story. Barbara Tennant plays the girl. Messrs. Francis and Johnstone, with another good player, fill the three male roles.

"WHAT FATHER DID" (Eclair), November 7.—A pretty home life comedy which comes from father's preference for his briar pipe over either a cigarette or cigar. His three daughters have beaus who call, and the old man is driven from the drawing room to the library, and then to the kitchen, where the cook and her beau make trouble for him. It has pretty girls, pretty scenes, and is naturally conducted, but not very exciting.

"THE SHIP AND THE LIONS" (Ambrosio), Nov. 6.—A sensational picture of a mutiny. The last scene shows the mutinous crew kept aloft on the mast by the lions on the deck while the ship is burning.

"HALF SHOT" (Imp), November 9.—A farcical picture with a situation that gets across. The man who was half shot they thought was shot, but he came to in time to save the man who had fired the gun, hoping to wake him, from being lynched.

"HOW HE GOT HIS RAISE" (Imp), November 9.—He gets it with the help of the maid of the boarding house. The "old man" knows that his wife is coming to the office, and the clerk telephones to the maid to come and make a scene just at the critical moment. He gets the old man out of the scrape and gets 50 cents a month added to his salary. Thos. McAlvoy plays the clerk; Richard Lee, the old man; Mary Liston, the wife, and Violet Horner, the maid. It is light, but doesn't drag.

"THE HONOR OF THE FAMILY" (Rex), November 7.—A picture pleasingly melodramatic in which we find our old friends, hero, heroine and villain, who always entertain us when they really live up to their characters. Hero and villain in this picture are brothers, the latter, the older son, heir to title and estate. The younger brother goes to a mining country and falls in love with a girl there. The older brother, on a gunning expedition, visits the place, and there is a secret marriage with this girl. Home again in England, he marries another woman. The younger brother knows it and protects the girl from learning of it. In time the villain dies and the hero marries the heroine and comes into the estate. It is humanly and naturally acted, the scenes are well made and often poetic, and the story moves smoothly without dragging.

"THE PRICE OF PARADISE" (Gaumont), November 14.—The Gaumont people certainly have a beautiful country in which to take their pictures. The backgrounds in this picture are, as usual, lovely; but just because beauty follows beauty in its scenes the story, well acted and well made in every way, loses in vigor. Such pictures give the mind too much to do; we must watch the backgrounds and the story at the same time, and while both are good, we can't help feeling that to separate the two would be economical. The picture will please.

"OLGA THE ADVENTUROUS" (Gaumont), November 12.—With the beautiful backgrounds, leafy scenes with sunlight, shadow and watery reflections, lovely garden views, etc., and with the perfectly trimmed interiors that we have grown to look for in the best Gaumont pictures, this two-reel offering gives us a story of life in France about 1830. Its object is situation rather than the delineations of character. Yet the story flows so smoothly and clearly and is so consistent in its atmosphere that, melodramatic as it is, it persuades us to believe it as a picture of human fates. It will hold attention with its story, and at the same time please with its beauty in every scene. We commend it as a good offering.

"AUNT BRIDGET" (Eclair), November 3.—A comedy of character by the French company, with a very clever player in the leading role as Aunt Bridget, a rather stout woman who has not much money, and who isn't treated as well as she would like by her nephew and niece. She procures an inheritance—or, at least, a letter about one—and some fake money. Her relatives learn about her fortune and invite her to their country home and show her every attention. They find out the secret and become very cold to Aunty, who in the meantime has won a fortune in a lottery. Comic Aunt Bridget makes the picture an excellent offering. The situation also is very commendable.

"THE DISTURBED SENTRY" (Great Northern), November 9.—The Great Northern people are providing excellent entertainment in these little thumb-nail sketches. This is very laughable; it is brightly conceived, fresh and, in its small way, a little gem. A true laugh-maker.

"THE LOST STUD" (Great Northern), November 9.—A slight sketch that will amuse. There is no real plot, but it runs smoothly and gives a few funny moments.

"THE LADDER OF LIFE" (Thanhouser), Nov. 5.—A story pointing out that the reward of industry is success to a poor boy, of dissipation is disaster in a rich boy—that is the way it worked in this instance. The picture is well worth while, however. It will encourage many a boy and man, too, trying to win out against intrenched "pull" and mediocrity.

"A STRANGE CASE" (Imp), Nov. 4.—Stories of necklaces, lost or stolen, are very frequent, but they always seem to exert the necessary fascination to make them successful. This one is interesting, though not overly original. The girl's father and then her lover are accused of the theft in turn, but the latter finally confesses after another crime has been fastened upon him. The jail scene is the strongest one. King Baggot is pleasing as the hero, but a little too unbending, since in one love scene he practically forces the girl to make the osculatory advances.

"AN OLD FASHIONED MOTHER" (Rex), Nov. 3.—A good story with the "home" atmosphere strong in it, and so well portrayed that it is of broad appeal. The old couple leave their seacoast cottage to visit their son in the city. His wife does not like them, and her snobbish, supercilious attitude is handled in effective contrast to the other characters. Grandmother's medicine of roots and herbs saves the little girl's life and wins the wife's lasting love. As good as a scene from "Shore Acres" or "The Old Homestead."

"HER MASTERPIECE" (Milano), Nov. 9.—This two-reel Russian drama contains much that is well done and effective and some things that will perhaps not appeal so strongly to an American audience. The Princess Sonia, jealous of her own sister, bribes Ivan, the groom, with a promised kiss, to destroy her sister's prize painting. This is done and the girl falls dead when she finds her masterpicce destroyed. Up to this point the picture is well acted and contains some new and vivid scenes, but the part which follows has a touch of the morbid in it. The remorse of Sonia, the quarrel with her sister's lover at the funeral and the suggestion of her own suicide combine to make the retribution too long drawn out and depressing.

"AN INDIAN ISHMAEL" (Bison-Universal), Nov. 9.—A good Indian picture, with an interesting plot and splendid pictorial effects. The Indian woman, sent out into the desert with her child, recalls the Biblical story indicated in the title. The woman dies, but white settlers take the child, which later renders great service to his tribe and becomes one of its leading men. The Indian camp, wagon train, etc., are attractively shown. The theft of the horses was accomplished a little too openly. The love scenes are pretty, but there is a tendency to "spooning" in many of these pictures of late. We should like to see more of the girl who played the part of Golden Willow.

"THE RAILROAD AND THE WIDOW" (Powers), Nov. 6.—A widow at warfare with a railroad which is attempting to take eight feet off her fence line. She defends her property so effectively that she shoots the railroad agent with her rifle. Her daughter shoots her mother in the arm with a pistol in order to allege self-defense. The plot, as will be seen, is not lacking in vigor, but the widow would have gotten more sympathy if she had not evinced a rather quarrelsome disposition from the beginning.

"SHARPS AND CHAPS" (Nestor), Nov. 8.—Because the girls of Roaring Gulch are all so taken with the masculine violin teacher who has come there for students, the cowboy contingent sends for a lady teacher to instruct them in band practice. This brings about intense rivalry, and, as the plot unfolds, it develops that both music teachers are already married. Conventional Western comedy, well portrayed.

"HIS LITTLE PARTNER" (Nestor), Nov. 6.—A first rate tale of the mining districts, complicated in plot, but clear and fascinating in its development. The little girl who rides to the registration offices to file papers ahead of the treacherous partner of the hero, furnishes a real thrill. The other features of the plot are also interesting. A certain favorite with almost any audience.

"THE BETTER PART" (Gem), Nov. 5.—The heroine, whose eyes are under treatment, tears away the bandages so she may see to rescue her lover from a bad plight. In so doing she sacrifices her sight for life, and wins his father's approval of their love. This picture will pass, but it has a rather "made to order" plot which somehows falls short of excellence.

"SILENT JIM" (Eclair), Nov. 5.—This two-reel film tells a gripping tale of the great Northwest and keeps the interest at high tension throughout. It is splendidly mounted in a scenic way, and the natural scenic effects are in keeping with the story. Alec Francis as "Silent Jim" is somewhat theatrical at moments, but very effective on the whole; Mr. Frazer gives us a Baptiste that is fully as good and at all times thoroughly natural. Miss Barbara Tennant makes a heroine worthy of the fierce emotions that center about her. The plot is clean, well balanced and contains many new incidents and situations.

"UNITED WE STAND" (Nestor), Nov. 4.—Two veterans dream the same dream of an incident on the field of battle, in which one of them gave the other a ring as a keepsake, while wounded. They quarrel, but discovery of the ring next day wipes out the bitterness. It also serves to bring together their son and daughter in marriage. A real march of the G. A. R. is incidentally shown. A good patriotic offering.

"OH! SUCH A NIGHT" (Crystal), Nov. 3.—If you were holding four aces and there was a big jackpot on the table and your wife came down and upset the game, wouldn't you be angry? Such is the commencement of the brisk little comedy shown in the first half of this reel. It is a good one. Pearl White plays the wife.

"MARRIAGE A LA CARTE" (Crystal), Nov. 3.—On same reel with above. George induces his stenographer to pose as his wife in order to deceive his Uncle Josh, who has a generous pocketbook. Complications ensue in a freshly amusing way. The two make a good offering.

"A PROTEGE OF UNCLE SAM" (Champion), Nov. 16.—Two-reel story, which we have reviewed before. Begins with the life story of a boy found in his dead mother's arms in the slums of New York. He is adopted by a wealthy family, but after his college days there is a reversion to type and he fails as a bank clerk and takes up a wild career. Good cabaret scenes from a popular restaurant are shown, followed by a realistic saloon brawl, as he makes his downward descent in life. Our sympathies are aroused and we wonder where the lad is going to wind up, when the naval review in New York harbor comes around, and inspires him to join the navy. This he does, and after the manly training he gets as a result, comes up smiling as a genuine hero and wins the girl who has been true to him all these years. The actual pictures of the fleet are entertaining and the whole double film a very commendable one.

"WEARY'S REVENGE" (Majestic), Nov. 3.—A tramp picture, in which Weary revenges himself upon Amos for kicking him, by stealing his coat. The coat contains money stolen by Amos from the father of the girl he is in love with. Weary hangs the coat on a scarecrow, and in the end it is brought out that Amos is a thief and hence he loses the girl. This is a passable comedy-drama.

"THE NEW LOVE AND THE OLD" (Solax), Nov. 6.—The chief strength in this picture lies in the fact that such things happen in real life. The young man finds that his intended, a spoiled girl with an appetite for bonbons and plenty of admiration, will not learn to care for his mother. In the end he sticks to his mother and lets the girl go. The players make the most of this idea.

"THROUGH THE FLAMES" (Thanhouser), Nov. 8.—This rather conventional story of the country girl who is lured to the city by a promise of stage employment, winds up with a startlingly realistic fire scene. This has seldom been done more effectively. With Flo La Badie and William Russell handling the leads the picture is assured of a good reception, as their work in this instance is very appealing.

"A BROTHER'S REQUITAL" (Reliance), Nov. 6.—Charles and John are brothers. The former, a weak, dissipated youth, is engaged to Edith. He commits forgery, the mother of the two young men dies, John falls in love with Edith, and in the end Charles sacrifices her to the stronger man. He takes John's promised position in the African mines. The photographic effects are good and the work of Charles, in particular, adds strength to the offering.

"THE MAN THEY SCORNED" (Broncho), Nov. 6.—One of the best two-reel stories turned out in a long while. Its leisurely start gives opportunity to develop the character of the hero, a young Jew recruit at Fort Custer, Arizona. Then, after the story has its hold upon the observer, the Indian attack follows. The call to arms, the battle scenes, and the rescues of the Colonel by the young hero are smoothly and graphically portrayed. Altogether it is stirring and satisfying. A desirable release.

"MABEL'S LOVERS" (Keystone), Nov. 4.—The more or less familiar idea in which the girl appears with welts inside her stockings, as she walks on the beach, in order to get rid of all her admirers but one. This one was, of course, wise. When the girl appears later, in her bathing suit, without the welts, the audience agrees that he had good judgmnt. Mabel Normand is the girl.

"AT IT AGAIN" (Keystone), Nov. 4.—On same reel as above. Two amateur Sherlock Holmes detectives dominate this picture with their antics. They succeed in jumbling the plot somewhat, but as they are really funny, and the plot is not important, they may be forgiven. Mack Sennett and Fred Mace play the twin detective role.

"SPIFFKINS EATS FROGS" (Lux), Nov. 8.—French eccentric comedy, in which the leading man eats frogs' legs and immediately has a bad case of the "jumps." He jumps over chairs and tables, out of windows, upon trains, bridges, etc., and is followed by an excited throng. Good of its kind.

"A MAGNETIC PERSONALITY" (Lux), Nov. 8.—Same reel as above. In which Weary Gussie, a tramp, carries about a number of strong magnets in his pockets. Things begin sticking to him, attracted by the magnets, and he soon has a mob of indignant people at his heels. Good picture of the chase.

"CUPID ON THE JOB" (Majestic), Nov. 5.—A whimsical fancy in which the Man Haters club and the Woman Haters club are brought together after bitter enmity, and many engagements ensue. The feature of the picture is a very pretty child figure dressed, or undressed, as Cupid. The child Cupid appears at intervals throughout the picture, with very pretty effect.

"A DAY ON THE BATTLESHIP FLORIDA" (Majestic), Nov. 5.—On same reel with above. Pictures of life aboard the warship Florida, as it lay in Hudson River recently. There are occasional glimpses of other vessels in the fleet also.

Remarkable Record.

OHIO writes that there is a shadow on his screen. This ghost is in the center, up and down, of the screen. It is narrow in the center, flaring out widely at either end. Sometimes it is small and sometimes large. When a short arc is burned, the spot on the screen is smaller, and vice versa. Instead of the craters forming properly, they generally form backward. Consequently he has to turn the carbons around. The current is 110 volt a.c., with about 40 amperes at the arc; Power's "Five" machine, which is old but in good shape. A new lens has been tried and the lamphouse has been placed in all possible positions. Ohio then continues: "In passing I might say that your Handbook and the Moving Picture World were responsible for me building up a show in this little town of 700 people, which is sure a winner. There is not a Saturday night that I miss the 550 mark on paid admissions, and the price is ten cents, too. I run three reels with two songs, and have thirty advertising slides."

As regards the spot on the screen, you did not say whether turning the carbon around, so that the crater faces the condenser, helped the trouble or not. The trouble is not in the condensers. Set your lamp at about the angle shown on page 87 of the Handbook and then give your lower carbons sufficient advancement to force the crater to form as shown at C, figure 33, page 88 of the Handbook. Your saying that the crater forms on the back side of the carbons leads me to believe that you are using set B, figure 33, or else set A, and this would very easily account for your difficulty. The trouble does not lie in your lenses. If the following of these suggestions does not remedy matters, kindly advise me further, and send me a sketch, showing just how your lamp and carbons are set.

As to the 550, ten-cent admission, that certainly is a record, in a town of 700. It is even more than remarkable, and is highly creditable to the Ohio brother.

Who Found It?

Baltimore, Md., writes:

> Have noticed in the department an article in reference to soaking carbons in brine. Mr. J. Gregory, a Baltimore operator, who first wrote you about this was not present when the salt soaking experiment was tried. It was, in fact, discovered by accident. The air at River Park, which is on the bayside, is very salty. The operator who was, at that time, running at Hale's Tours of the World, ran out of projector carbons, it being Sunday, and no more could be obtained. He, therefore, took some common arc light carbons and tried them in the lamp, discovering to his surprise that they gave a very fine light. Thinking these carbons would give him better results he bought some, but found they did not deliver the goods. He again tried those he had picked up, compared them with the new ones. Noticing white streaks, such as salt generally leaves on things, he soaked the carbons he had bought in salt brine, and thus the discovery was made.

In the first place Baltimore, you are in error in assuming that Brother Gregory claimed any credit whatsoever for the salt soaking idea. He did not; neither did he write me concerning it. The facts are as follows: I was in Baltimore and Brother Gregory, who was on the committee appointed to look after my entertainment, took me out to his theater. I noticed the very soft, mellow brilliancy of the light, and supposed it to be D. C. until he, much to my surprise, told me differently. He also informed me of the reasons therefore, and I published them. He did not claim any credit for the discovery, nor has he ever done so. The carbons the operator found must have been in some manner soaked in salt water. While the air from the ocean contains a peculiar quality, it contains very little, if any, salt. Salt is much heavier than air and would instantly sink to the ground, and if your air soaking theory is correct, all the buildings and ground near the ocean would be covered with salt.

More Law.

Shawnee, Okla., writes:

> The City Council of Shawnee has recently passed some pretty stringent regulations in reference to moving picture shows. Among other things it has specified that the films must be rewound inside the booth. I am informed that recently New York City has specified that they must be rewound outside of the booth. If this is correct, I would be greatly obliged if you would favor me with a copy of the ordinance.

Here in New York there is very little actual law governing operating room procedure. It is mostly regulated by rules made by the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity. The only thing I can find concerning the rewinding of films is as follows: (extract from rules and regulations printed on back of application for license to operate moving picture apparatus and its connections). "The commissioner reserves the right to revoke or suspend the license for any of the following causes: Having any film exposed in booth at any time, other than the one film in process of transfer to or from machine, or from upper to lower magazine. Allowing films to be rewound in booth while machine is being operated." The real meaning of this is, of course, that the films must be rewound outside the operating room. The City of Boston (or rather the Commonwealth of Massachusetts), gravely informs us (page 14, section 21, of rules and regulations governing moving picture operators' machines), that: "All films must be rewound or repaired in the booth or enclosure surrounding the machine." So you see that the voice of authority in Boston, which assumes to possess knowledge sufficient to regulate operating room procedure, declares that a certain thing is right and proper; whereas the very opposite is declared right and proper by the same kind of an authority in the City of New York and—there you are. As the operating rooms of Boston and New York are constructed—that is to say under the legal requirements for the construction of operating rooms in those two cities, it doesn't make much or any difference whether the films are rewound inside the room or outside the operating room, but with a properly constructed operating room the film should by all means be rewound inside the room.

Power's "Six" Trouble.

Brooklyn, N. Y., writes:

> Have a brand new Power's Six which has a grinding sound at times. With the framing carriage down as far as it will go, the machine runs like a clock, but if I frame up a little the grinding noise starts. If I run very slowly it stops, or if I frame clear up it ceases. There is a certain point, just below the center frame where the noise starts in. There is a bar underneath the flywheel, with a slot in each end, and a screw in the middle. I tightened this screw but it did no good; neither did tightening the set-screws which hold the casting against the framing bar. The noise was still there, although it sounds a little different. It is a half grind, half humming sound. I can think of no other cause except the toggle.

I think, Brooklyn, the trouble is that the toggle gear idler, which is made of fibre, has swelled, and is now a little too large. With the carriage clear down (lever up as far as it will go) try the end of the horizontal bar. If you find it is loose so that it will move sidewise, carrying the sliding bar with it, then the sliding bar is loose in its ways and should be tightened. However, you seem to have taken care of all this, and have done exactly the right things, therefore I think the trouble lies in the gear itself, and you will have to take the machine to the factory at No. 90 Gold Street, New York. The repair will cost you nothing, except the trouble of taking the machine down to Gold Street.

Clamp Screws Burned.

Ely, Minn., writes:

> Have trouble with the screws in my carbon holders. They melt at the end which presses against the carbons. All connections were tested, except Compensarc, and found O. K. Am using Electra cored carbons, top and bottom. Could it be the carbons or is it the screws themselves? Using 110 volts, 60 cycle current.

The trouble, Ely, no doubt lies in the fact that your carbons are not making good contact with the holders, thus forcing nearly all the current through the screws. Clean out the inside of your carbon-holders thoroughly, using a file or scraper; also file off the burned end of the screw. If you find the inside of the carbon arm is rough or pitted, either file it down smooth and perfectly flat, or else get new carbon arms. The inside of the carbon arms should be thoroughly cleaned at least once a week. I would suggest, however, that that type of carbon arm is rather out of date for use with heavy amperage. You would do well, I think, to get an improved type of carbon clamp.

Ghost.

Sheffield, Pa., writes:

> We have a Power's Six machine, using two 7½ condensers and between 25 and 35 amperes from 104 volt line. We use 25 cycle a.c. to run a 5 h.p. motor, pulling a 4½ k.w. generator. This gives us direct current. We get one of the brightest and smoothest lights I have seen, but am troubled with a ghost just above the center of the screen. Our throw is 54 feet with a 12-foot picture.

In the first place, Sheffield, be sure that your optical system is in line. A method of lining the machine was given on page 247, October 19 issue. In the second place, put rings of asbestos behind the rear condenser lens so as to bring it within ⅛ of an inch of the front condenser lens. In the third place, be sure that your carbons are set right (page 88 of the handbook). In the fourth place, try pulling your lamphouse back and forward—not the lamp, but the lamphouse. In one of these things, or perhaps any two or more of them combined, I am sure you will find your trouble.

Fort Wayne Compensarc.

From the Northwest comes an interesting letter, in which a brother sets forth the troubles he has had on the road, and how a great many of them were overcome.

> I am using a 1912 model Motiograph, taking 110 volt, 60 cycle current through a compensarc; running on the 50 ampere contact. The various contacts deliver 40, 50, and 60 amperes respectively, but the day service in this city is pretty bad, which causes our pictures to be rather dark. The boss has sent for a 50, 60 and 70 ampere Fort Wayne compensarc. Now what am I going to do, as they will only let me use a 60 ampere block on the feed? I told the boss we could not use 70, but he said "do it;" so what am I to do? If I put 70 ampere fuses on a 50 ampere block, as I see it, I will not have any light at all. It will be a case of "where was Moses when the light went out," very quickly after the current is turned on. Won't I have to have at least a 70 ampere block?

Plainly your knowledge of transformer action is limited. I would certainly recommend that you forward $2.50 to this office in return for which a copy of the new Hand-book will be sent you by, or soon after November 15. This book will explain these matters fully. If you were using a rheostat, pulling 70 amperes, you would have to use at least a 70 ampere fuse block and fuses. However, you can pull 70 amperes on the secondary of a compensarc, working on 110 volt line, and only be pulling approximately 22 amperes from the line; or to be liberal, let us say, 25 amperes. In other words, use 70 amperes at the arc and only use 30 ampere fuses on the primary wires—that is to say the wires feeding the compensarc. The way to figure this is as follows: Multiply the arc voltage, which in this case would be between 30 and 35, by the arc amperage, which gives you the watts consumed at the lamp. Divide this by the line voltage and it will give you the approximate primary amperage. This is by reason of the fact that the wattage taken from the primary and used on the secondary are equal, except for the slight loss in the transformer, though this is qualified to some extent by what is called the power factor. All these things are fully explained in the new Hand-book, which I would advise you by all means to procure. To sum up, your 60 ampere fuses are not only large enough, but are altogether too large. To pull 70 amperes at the arc through a compensarc, don't use fuses larger than 30 amperes, or 35 at the outside on the primary wires.

Chemical Explanation.

Cincinnati, Ohio, contributes the following:

I notice in the last issue of the Moving Picture World that some of the brothers are having trouble using carbons that have been soaked in brine, on account of their corrosive action, and will endeavor to explain this to you from a chemical standpoint. Salt (or sodium chloride) is composed of sodium and chlorine, the latter being very corrosive, and when combined with free hydrogen in the air, or moisture, forms hydrochloric acid: Chemical formula CL + H = HCL, which attacks iron very readily. Now when the carbons are burning the intense heat at the tips volatilizes and partly decomposes the salt into chlorine gas and metallic sodium, and collecting in the interior of the lamp-house, corrodes the iron. Although never having tried this carbon soaking I cannot imagine the good it would do unless the yellow flame given off by the sodium modifies the harshness of the white light, giving it a softer and clearer tone. Theoretically, it is my opinion that soaking carbons in sodium bichromate and sulphuric acid is a better stunt (this was suggested by a brother in this column some months ago), as in decomposing, oxygen would be liberated producing a white, brilliant light. If you care to have it, I will send you a modified formula of the above, which eliminates the handling of the sulphuric acid and producing the same resultant products, namely: Sodium sulphate and chromium trioxide.

We are obliged to Cincinnati for what we have no doubt is the correct chemical solution of the matter. We shall also be glad to have the modified formula spoken of. That is exactly what the salt does, Cincinnati—softens the light.

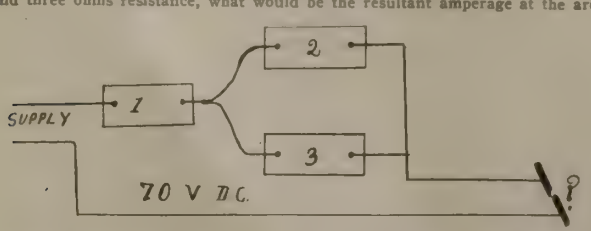
An Address.

Bay City, Mich., asks for the address of the Gaumont talking picture man, meaning the American office. Wishes also to know his initials.

Mr. Herbert Blache is the only American representative of Gaumont. Address him care of The Gaumont Co., Flushing, L. I.

Answer to Resistance Problem.

In October 5 issue the following resistance problem was propounded: If a rheostat of one ohm resistance be switched in series with a projection arc, and also in series with a two-rheostat multiple containing respectively two and three ohms resistance, what would be the resultant amperage at the arc.



Special replies have been received. The correct answer would depend on the arc voltage, of course. Taking that at 48 it would be 10 amperes. The problem is worked as follows: the combined resistance of a multiple is found by multiplying their separate resistances, in ohms, together and dividing that result by the sum of their separate resistances. In the case in hand the resistances of the multiple were two and three ohms. We therefore have $2 \times 3 = 6 \div 5 = 1\frac{1}{5}$, or, expressed decimally, for convenience, 1.2 ohms. The remaining rheostat has one ohm resistance, therefore the total resistance of the three is 1.2 + 1 = 2.2 ohms. The arc is operating at 48 amperes, therefore it leaves only 70 — 48 = 22 volts to be taken care of by the resistance. C ÷ R = E, therefore 22 ÷ 2.2, the answer.

The Resistance Problem.

New York contributes the following reply to the resistance problem, on page 47, October 5th issue. He says:

To find the joint resistance of two rheostats of different capacity, first find the reciprocal of the number of ohms in one, and then in the other, add the two together and find the reciprocal of their sum thus obtained. The reciprocal of two ohms is one-half and the reciprocal of three ohms is one-third. ½ + ⅓ = 5/6, and the reciprocal of 5/6 is 1⅕, therefore 1⅕ is the joint resistance of the two and three ohm rheostats, and this added to one ohm equals 2⅕ ohms as the total resistance of the three when connected. 70 volts ÷ 2⅕ ohms = 30 9/11 amperes, which is the result at the arc. Will you kindly let me know if I am right?

No, New York, you are not right, for the very simple reason that you have left out one very important equation, viz.: the resistance of the arc itself, which will consume an average of 48 lts of the 70 volt pressure. I present the correct solution of this problem in column one of this page.

Glass Ports.

Mr. L. B. Seymour, Rex Theater, Glenwood, Iowa, contributes the following:

In October 12th issue I notice you ask for reports from those having unsatisfactory results from salt soaking, similar to those reported by Brother Linstruth. I soaked different batches of Electra ¾ cored carbons for a period of one to four days, and dried them a week before using. The arc sputtered and flamed badly; also kept traveling around the carbons. The current is 60 cycle through a Fort Wayne compensarc. I tried 30, 40 and 60 amperes. The carbons needled badly and the light was hard to control. I gave it up as unsatisfactory. As to the glass in observation ports, as spoken of by Ontario in October 19th issue, will say that I have used glass in my ports for some time. As the light is brighter inside the operating room than outside, I found it difficult to see the picture on the screen, until I made what is really a box without any top or bottom, and just the size of the observation port. I made this from light gauge black iron, about ten inches deep, and fastened it to the wall so as to form a shade on all sides of the port, painting the inside black. I could then easily see the picture, even when three or four feet back from the port.

I would call your attention, friend Seymour, to the fact that you must make the brine a certain definite strength, viz.: strong enough to float a fresh egg two-thirds out of the brine. Those who have succeeded, have soaked their carbons in such a brine from ten to fourteen days. I do not believe very much salt would penetrate the carbons in from one to four days, and it is quite possible that this may be the secret of your failure. As to the box around the port, it really amounts to a shadow box ten inches deep, and it seems to me that if it works the way you say it does, you have contributed something of real value. It will not be much of a job for any brother to try this out. Set a pane of ordinary window glass over the port temporarily, and get an ordinary wooden box ten inches deep, and the size of the port. Knock the bottom out of it, paint the inside black and place it temporarily over the port. Report results.

Boosting the Convention.

Mr. L. L. Goldsmith, Moving Picture Machine Operators' Local Union 154, Seattle, Wash., sends a copy of a letter now being sent out by Seattle's local union. By unanimous vote, the Seattle Central Labor Union recently agreed to assist Local 154 in the entertainment of the I. A. T. S. E. International Convention, which meets in Seattle, July, 1913. A committee has been appointed, consisting of the operators' committee, five from the Central Labor Council, and one from each local union in the city. The operators will give their first benefit at the Clemmer Theater, Friday afternoon, November the first, one to six P. M., the proceeds to form the beginning of the convention entertainment fund. All this looks very much as though the I. A. T. S. E. convention will have a warm time, both as to the weather and otherwise, when it meets in Seattle next July.

Shutter Pattern.

Kansas City, Mo., writes:

Taking note in your request for reports on the three-wing shutter pattern. Bartlesville has evidently made a mistake in measurements, issue, will say that through curiosity I made a shutter from the pattern. Bartlesville has evidently made a mistake in measurements, as the pattern has excess diameter of a quarter of an inch for my Edison Exhibition machine, with slots filed in the frame at that. However, after finally succeeding in fitting the shutter, I am pleased to report the results justified the trouble, as it unquestionably does eliminate some of the flicker, and gives a little better illumination. A brother states he uses a pin-hole projector to show the arc on the upper magazine, giving a front view of the crater. You inform the brother that the projector from the side is the better, to which I agree; but why not use both of them?

I am glad to know that Bartlesville's idea worked out satisfactorily. Possibly the excess diameter was my own fault, or the fault of the engraver. Certainly both arc projectors could be used. You can go as far as you like in that matter.

Again Glass Ports.

From a suburb of Philadelphia comes the following:

I am an operator at the Elite Picture House in this town; also a reader of the World, which I have followed up pretty closely ever since I have been in the business. I have profited by the experience of others who have donated their share to the department. In October 12th issue I read of a brother who uses glass in his ports; also that you asked for reports from others doing the same. I have been using glass in my ports for some time and have experienced no trouble whatever. I did at first have shadows on the inside of the glass of my look-out port. These were caused by reflection from the back wall of the room, which is plastered. The whole back of my lamphouse is open, and of course it sheds considerable light. To remedy this, I simply darkened the back wall. Now I have no shadows at all. With a pane of clear glass in front of the projection lens it makes absolutely no difference whatever in the picture. I work for a firm, the members of which are pretty particular about the projection end of their show, yet they never noticed the difference when I put the glass in; in fact, did not know I had it in until I told them. The glass in the ports deadens the sounds in the operating room and although my machine is kept in perfect running order, there is, of course, the noise of the film passing through. I use a good grade of machine oil on all bearings and a mixture of graphite on the gears, which I find is very satisfactory.

I readily concede a certain amount of advantage in having glass in the ports, provided it does not interfere with a clear view of the picture. There is often consbiderable noise in the operating room; also the operator frequently would like to talk to his helper without the sound carrying into the auditorium. Glass in the ports would confine such sounds to the operating room. If all operators would use either a light dynamo oil, or a good grade of machine oil, bought by the pint at any oil dealer, there would be fewer repair bills; also a great deal less oily, greasy film. Very light, thin oils not only are totally unfit for projection machinery, but they run or fly off and daub up the film. I have no hesitancy in saying that the use of thin, light, much advertised oils is causing at least $1,000 a day damage to projection machinery in this country.

Edison Lower Loop.

Mr. D. L. Doyle, Silver State Film Exchange, Pueblo, Col., comments on the Edison lower loop losing trouble as follows:

Notice in your issue of the 19th, an operator takes up the matter of losing the lower loop on the Edison machine. I have no doubt there are a great many cases where trouble is caused by failure to properly adjust the idler bracket. But there is still another reason for this particular trouble which might be well worth considering. The Edison Company makes a steel roller with only one flange which travels on the sprocket rim, outside the teeth. If those having a machine thus equipped, and who are troubled with losing the lower loop, will take off the steel idler, installing a fiber one instead, they will find they can run almost any kind of film without more than the ordinary amount of trouble. The late style Edison long bracket is also an improvement. I have been watching this trouble for three years, being in the commercial film business, and have found these things out from actual experience. The fiber idlers can be purchased from any supply company. I trust this may be of benefit to some one, as it has been to me.

We are indebted to brother Doyle for the information set forth. Unless I am mistaken, his claim concerning the fiber idlers is backed up by similar comments from two or three other correspondents, though this was some time ago—more than a year. There is little doubt but that exchange men could set forth a great many kinks which would be of distinct value to operators and managers if they would take the trouble to do so. They are in a position to learn of a great many things through conversation with operators and otherwise. It would be distinctly to the benefit of exchanges, whose business depends upon the popularity of the photo play, to contribute any information they may possess which would be of benefit to projection; and they are most cordially invited to do so.

Resistance.

One of our Canadian brothers contributes the following:

I have noticed in the department a claim that a rheostat in connection with a private light plant is only a waste of power. Have 6 h.p. special electric gasoline engine with a 5 k.w., 110 volt d.c. generator, belt drive. I disconnected the rheostat and wired direct to lamp switch; reduced the generator voltage to 60 and struck an arc, with a result that it wabbled all over and blew my fuses in about a minute. That was my experience without a rheostat. I have very little difficulty with my light plant now, though for the first three months I had trouble, due to the fact that I did not understand it. However, I would say to those who are paying light companies excessive prices, or to those in towns where no electric light exists, take a chance and put in your own plant. You will soon learn to take care of it. Cost of operation is gasoline only. I pay twenty-nine cents a gallon and use about fifteen gallons a week, running three hours a night and one show Saturday afternoon. Number of lights used are thirty 2 c.p., one 50 c.p. and twelve 30 watt tungstens, which, together with the arc, consumes my full capacity. We project a ten foot picture at 50 feet and have a fine light, but for a larger picture I do not know just how this would work out. Another thing: This plant will not work on an Edison rheostat. I use a Motiograph and get from 25 to 30 amperes, but it does not seem sufficient to drive through an Edison when all the resistance possible is cut out. What size building would you suggest as being most suitable for a photoplay house—population about 2,000, prefer about 350 seats. I expect to build on a lot 36 x 130, or else fix up a place already built; size 45 x 50. Is a long narrow hall better than a short wide one? The 45 x 50 feet would be lengthened some. Would it be too wide by, say 60 × 45?

As regards the rheostat, your knowledge is weak and your ideas somewhat twisted, Canada. In the first place, the Edison rheostat would work just the same as any other rheostat, provided it is built for 110 volts, but you may have a 220 volt rheostat, which would only deliver very small amperage on 110 volts pressure. It is a fact that the rheostat represents waste, but it is also a fact that you have to have a rheostat in circuit with your arc lamp, unless you are using a special type of generator, since otherwise the arc cannot be controlled. The point is the arc voltage will average 48 and the difference between the arc and the line voltage is dissipated in the rheostat, and this represents waste, hence the higher the line voltage, the more energy dissipated on the rheostat in the form of heat. If your line voltage is 60 and your amperage 30, then you would waste in the rheostat 60 — 48 = 12 volts, which multiplied by 30 would be 360 watts. On the other hand, if your line voltage is 110, then you would waste 110 ÷ 48 = 62, which multiplied by 30 equals 1,860 watts. As regards the size of house, 50 feet is a little wider than I would prefer, since those seated to one side nearer the front are compelled to view the picture at a very wide angle, which gives the characters an attenuated appearance—that is to say, they appear very tall and thin. In building a new house, I think I would prefer a width of about, say thirty feet or maybe thirty-five, with a length sufficient to get the desired seating capacity. Now, please do not misunderstand me in this. There are a great many houses fifty feet and even more than that in width, which are successfully showing pictures. I am only telling you what I would consider as the nearest to ideal. A picture never appears at its best when viewed at a heavy angle. To use the old hall and lengthen it to 60 feet, I would have a four foot aisle on either side and one in the center, thus making two sections of seats. The new Handbook gives you full instructions on how to figure the seating capacity. To sum up, I will reply to your question by saying that, within reasonable limits, the long narrow hall is better than the wide short one—within reasonable limits, mind you, I said. Anything can be overdone.

Six Day Week.

We are informed that San Francisco's Local Union, No. 162, has informed all managers of that city that it is illegal to cause their employees to labor more than six days in any one week; also that L. U. 162 has embodied in its by-laws a clause providing that "Six days shall constitute a week's work; the same being effective October the 14th."

Inasmuch as the demand is reasonable, as well as right from any and every point of view, we have no doubt that the demand of Local 162 will be granted. In fact, several of the houses conceded the demand before the date on which it went into effect. There is no question of wages involved. Incidentally let me say that many houses expect their operators to be "on the job" three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. This not only is reprehensible from the humanitarian point of view, but it is also bad practice from the business viewpoint, though managers making such unreasonable demands do not seem to realize this fact. No man who works straight through every day in the week, even though the hours be comparatively short, will for very long continue to do the best work possible. He becomes weary and tired with the eternal sameness of things. This thing of spending so many hours a day in a room and doing it every day in the year becomes fearfully monotonous. Aside from the labor involved, there is a physiological effect, and that effect will, in time, be reflected on the screen of the theater. Of course, we know, and must concede, that the manager does not like to have a relief man in his operating room, since the relief man will not be in a position to do the best possible work, through lack of familiarity with the operating room. This must be conceded as a genuine objection to a six-day week from the manager's point of view. Therefore the wise manager will, without coercion on the part of the union, and even where no union exists, allow his operator one day off in every seven. It cannot be even held unreasonable to allow the operator a six day week, even where the show only operates from two to three hours in the evening. Under these conditions, it must be remembered that, while it is true the operator has all day to himself, still a larger percentage of the operators are comparatively young men and those who are not, are, for the most part, married, and the evening is the logical time for recreation. The evening show house usually operates during the daytime on holidays, such as the Fourth of July, Christmas, etc., so that the seven-day-a-week evening show operator has absolutely no opportunity to enjoy the amusements open to his fellow men, since these amusements are only available during the hours he is at work. If he be a married man, he cannot take his wife out in the evening at all, and on holidays, when other men are enjoying themselves, he is hard at work, his wife being left alone to get through the day of merriment as best she may. All this, Mr. Manager, constitutes a very genuine grievance and a logical objection to the six day week, wholly and entirely aside from any question of labor or wages. That you, yourself, may be obliged to put in the same hours, seven days a week, has nothing to do with the question. If you thus deprive yourself, you are presumably reaping the monetary reward for so doing; whereas the operator is working for a stipulated wage, which is, as a rule, in no wise increased, because he is obliged to work on holidays. The wage which he receives should be for a six day week, the same as it is for any other class of labor. Think it over, gentlemen, and after you have thought it over, try and look at it from the operator's point of view, and then consider that you yourself will get better service by conceding the six day week to the man who occupies your operating room.

Double Spot.

Goldsboro, N. C., is fighting the double spot proposition, and according to his letter it is some scrap. He writes as follows:

For some time I have been having considerable trouble with my spot, but am resting easy in the hope of finding its remedy through the Projection Department. The spot seems to divide at the aperture and form into two. When I bring it down as small as possible I have a dark streak in the picture. Am using Power's "Six" machine; two-wing shutter; 7½ front condenser and 6½ rear; 60 amperes of 110 volt A. C.

The double spot, Goldsboro, is sometimes a pretty tough proposition. In the first place be sure that your lamp has the proper angle and that the carbons are set as they should be (see page 88 of the Handbook). It is quite possible the trouble comes from your lamp being set too straight up and down, thus giving you the double spot through the fact that you are using both the upper and lower crater. Also be sure that your condensing lenses set square with each other; that is to say, that one lens does not set straight up and down and the other leaning one way or the other considerably. You must understand, Goldsboro, that there is always a little tendency to double spot where A. C. is used, but this should not be excessive as it is in your case. If you are using 60 amperes, you should have a good spot without much tendency to double. I have found this double spot proposition a very difficult question to deal with, and would be glad to hear from brother operators who have had experience with it.

MOTION PICTURES IN MOHAMMEDAN COUNTRIES.

A WRITER in the "Kinematograph," published at Duesseldorf, treats of the management of motion picture theaters in Mohammedan countries. What he says is interesting and at times full of unconscious humor. "In the last two years," says the author, "many Europeans have engaged in the moving picture business in the Mohammedan countries of the Far East. As a rule they have made money. This was but natural, for the picture speaks a language which all can understand and is therefore enjoyed by people of all tongues. Exhibitors in these parts have much to learn and in order to be successful they must thoroughly understand the religion, the customs and the morals of their patrons. These things vary greatly often within a small territory. The exhibitor has to depend for his patronage on the natives, for the Europeans have all sorts of pleasure and sport offered to them while the natives must be thankful for any kind of diversion. Properly conducted, the electric theater appeals to the native more than any other form of amusement.

One of the problems of the exhibitors consists in catering to women. Women cannot visit places of amusement with men; indeed, with the stricter sects of the Hindoos, it is a law that women cannot be permitted to dwell under the same roof with strange men. No exhibitor should take this as a joke, for a bloody riot might follow the intrusion or even the accidental presence of a man anywhere within the theater. The police might arrive too late to save the manager and other male employees from being murdered. Other sects allow women in places of amusement which are also visited by men, but the women must then be placed in a section by themselves, where they cannot possibly be seen by any male eyes. All performances for women must take place before sunset. No exhibitor will be able to make a permanent success of his enterprise unless he has at least bi-weekly performances for women. These performances had best be scheduled for an early hour, say 11 o'clock a. m., with a second show at about 3 o'clock, enabling the dark-skinned ladies to get home before dark. The ladies want these performances to be conducted in a leisurely way with plenty of long intermissions which they can devote to the care of their babies, the eating of candy, the drinking of tea, and the exchange of gossip. With these women time is not at all precious; they have plenty and to spare. The visit to the motion picture theater is an event for them and they want to enjoy it to the utmost. The servants and families are taken along to the show, but it is expected that the servants are admitted free of charge." The writer naively adds, that no special programs are required for the ladies and that the same films which appeal to the somewhat savage tastes of their lords will do for the gentler sex.

Motion Pictures in Australia.

In Sydney, Australia, the motion picture has for some weeks past been in the limelight of public attention. Motion pictures in Australia seem to command far more respect with the press and the public than in some of the older and less progressive countries of the world. The daily papers in the large cities contain columns upon columns of advertisements setting forth in good language the attractions of the various moving picture programmes. The programmes are announced in great detail. Some of the advertisements inserted by the moving picture theaters surpass in space and beauty of typographic dress.

At a national council of women held recently in Sydney the majority of the speakers dealing with the subject of motion pictures were decidely friendly in their attitude. One or two of the speakers seemed to find fault with an occasional "bad" picture and as seems to be the rule with this type of mind proceeded to denounce moving picture entertainments in general. A well known moving picture man of Australia, Mr. J. T. Williams, has replied to these hostile strictures in a letter published in the Sydney Morning Herald. Mr. Williams says among other things:

> "To argue that because a few film pictures, of indifferent taste and uncertain utility have been shown in some places, all motion pictures are bad, is thoughtless and futile, and one might as well say that there shall be no national picture galleries, no literature, no art of any kind. Present day pictures are nearly all above criticism. The onward movement is in the direction of associating sound, practical education with the entertainment of the people. The picture programme of the future will achieve this goal, by portraying public events and scenes of interest, by bringing the direct living knowledge of strange and unknown peoples and countries to the very doors of the people, thus teaching history to the adult and juvenile, as history could never be taught in schools. The public demand drama. We give them the best. If we gave them none, they would go to the theaters for it. Even here, then, we are helping civilization along towards a better state of things. Really, hostile criticism of the motion picture, especially on mere ethical grounds, is as out of date as the work of the rock artist would be in the studio. And as for surroundings and their influence, well, I know of no schools so excellently arranged from a hygienic point of view as our picture theaters."

A German exhibitor recently showed two pictures with these titles "The Curse of Sin" and "Burning Love." Thereupon the German police threatened to confiscate the reels and arrest him unless he would change the titles. Other titles more or less objectionable had recently been forbidden by the police. The exhibitor declined to submit to the action of the police, which he regarded as arbitrary and illegal and appealed to the higher Court. The latter has just now handed down a lengthy opinion in which it declares that the action of the police was entirely unwarranted and that they had no jurisdiction whatsoever to interfere with the selection of the titles for moving pictures.

OTIS SKINNER VISITS SELIG PLANT.

Mr. Otis Skinner, the eminent actor, now playing a prolonged engagement in the Arabian Night spectacle, "Kismet," at the Illinois Theater, Chicago, was an enthusiastic spectator at the Selig Chicago Plant last Monday. Mr. Skinner was the personal guest of Mr. W. N. Selig, president of the company. In Mr. Skinner's party were his business manager and his stage director. The party spent all morning at the plant watching the many interesting intricacies of motion picture production. Mr. Skinner was especially enthusiastic over a scene being then produced by Mr. Oscar Eagle, whom he has known for some time. Before leaving Mr. Skinner stated that in his opinion, "the motion picture was destined to make as wonderful an advancement in the future as it has in the past."

SELIG WILL SOON RELEASE "THE MILLIONAIRE COWBOY."

A few years ago the Selig Polyscope Company released one of their feature western pictures under the title of "The Millionaire Cowboy." This film proved to be one of the most popular releases of recent years, and many have been the requests on the part of exhibitors to reproduce and release this great comedy. Acceding to these requests, the Selig Company recently produced this subject, elaborating upon the original story and improving it in many particulars. The new production is in two reels and is expected to prove one of the greatest masterpieces ever released by this remarkable institution. It will be booked for release very shortly.

"THE TRIALS OF FAITH" (Reliance).

Miss Gertrude Robinson plays the leading role in this very pretty picture of early days in New England. It was a time when it wasn't safe to know more than one's neighbors, or to be different from others in any way. Faith, a demure and winsome maid, was different; she was sweeter, more intelligent and more unselfish, at least, than one jealous relative of hers. It happened that she had made strong friends, else she would have died as a witch.

The picture opens with a few sketches, giving the atmosphere of the place and time and serving as a frame into which the story is to be set. We find two young people who accept each other as lovers, because their parents want it so. One of these sketches is an interior of a log house, roomy and comfortable with such furnishings and ornaments as would probably be found in a Puritan home of the time. This house is the home of the girl, Priscilla. Her lover is the governor's son, named John.

Scene from "The Trials of Faith" (Reliance).

Into this scene, Faith, a poor relative from England, is introduced. She is accepted as a burden, is treated scornfully and made to drudge by Priscilla and her mother. A few days later, John, coming with his father to call on Priscilla, sees Faith at the spinning wheel. Very sweet is the picture she makes and we are not surprised when he falls in love with her. He is not the kind of man to hide his affection and, defying his father, he makes it known at once. There is consternation in the room for a moment. Faith is hustled upstairs, out of the way, and John leaves the house. The scene that follows shows the lovers seated on a log in the woods.

Not far away, an Indian medicine man falls, dislocating his ankle. Faith and John hear his cry and help him back to his village. He becomes a good friend of Faith's and teaches her the medicinal herbs and how to use them. She learns quickly and puts her knowledge to good use. A sick child is cured by her and a fainting old woman is helped. Priscilla sees this and, filled with jealousy because Faith has won John away from her, accuses Faith of being a witch. Even the old woman whom she had helped now returns the favor by helping her accusers. The governor is only too glad to entertain the suspicion against her and she is tried and condemned for witchcraft.

John is in despair, but remembers how friendly the Indians are toward her. To them he applies for help. The scene changes to the place where Faith is to be burned. We find her bound to a tree with fagots prepared. The Puritans kneel in prayer and then the governor orders the fire applied to the pyre. It begins to smoke; but at this point the Indians break through the crowd and rescue the girl. The closing scene is very lonely. It is a picture of sunset across a wide river (the Hudson River furnished this background) and shows John and Faith embarking in a canoe for a land where they can live their lives together. Their friend, the medicine man, who has guided them this far, turns back, and the lovers move out across the water. A delightful ending to a fine picture.

"TRAPPER LILL, KING OF SCOUTS" (Bison).

"Trapper Bill, King of Scouts," the latest 101 Bison offering, released November 2, maintains the standard for vigor and thrill set by former pictures of this make. It takes a typical character of the early West for its hero. Trapper Bill is the best kind of American pioneer, fearless, quick with the trigger, but cool headed and chivalrous. The story is biographical and full of dramatic incidents, the best of which come after he enlists under the Stars and Stripes for service with Gen. Kearney in the Mexican War. We have had many pictures of the Revolutionary War and of the Civil War; but the war with Mexico seems to have been overlooked, although one maker has filmed the Alamo, in the Texan war with the southern republic. This gives to Trapper Bill's story an added freshness of interest.

In the opening scene we find the scout in a quarrel with a drunken bully named Shunan, who appears again and again in the picture as the story's villain. With a near-by tribe of Indians there is a beautiful girl. Bill has met her and treated her courteously; they are friends. But Shunan has taken a fancy to her and barters for her with her father, the chief. She is very reluctant, but is compelled to go. Her new master, it is plain, will treat her brutally. She attempts to escape, but is overtaken at the edge of a cliff. There is a fierce struggle, for she is desperate. Bill, setting traps below, sees her difficulty and scaling the rocks comes to her assistance. Shunan is thrown over the cliff, but saves himself and limps away. Bill takes Silver Heels to the chief, pays for her more than Shunan gave and they are married at the mission church.

Shunan, very drunk, comes to the settlement where the two are. From behind and without warning, he shoots, missing Bill, who is on his horse, but knocking his hat off. Silver Heels, snatching Bill's pistol and turning her horse, shoots Shunan through the arm. Thus wounded, he becomes a renegade, joins the Indians and leads them in a raid on a herd of horses owned by white men. Bill leads the cowboys and trappers, who overcome the red men, destroy their tepees and recover their horses. Shunan escapes to make further trouble. These scenes are thrillers; they were taken in a beautiful country and give many lovely glimpses of natural scenery.

A few years slip by. Silver Heels dies and Bill is left alone. Passing the mission with some of his friends, they learn, through the padre, that war has been declared with Mexico and Bill proposes that the trappers form a regiment. He is elected captain, although he doesn't want the honor, and, a few days later, he brings his men in to Gen. Kearney.

The incident that follows takes up nearly the whole of the second reel and it is fine. Perhaps there is nothing that will be surer to please the average spectator than to see, when women and children are held as prisoners by the enemy, the stars and stripes ride past their prison doors and rescue come. The rescue is, in this case, due to Bill. He, with Kearney and his men, had been cornered by Mexican cavalry who intended to wipe them out. But Bill broke through the line, ran to Gen. Taylor at the fort. The relief that came to save Kearney carried through to the town and saved the women and children. Bill marries one of the rescued girls.

Trapper Bill is Charles Bartlet; Shunan, Roy Watson; Silver Heels, Mona Darkfeather; Chief Tobyano, Chief Phillipi; Padré, J. K. Messick; Mexican General, Jack Leonard; General Kearney, Wm. Bertram; Mrs. Parker, Jane Keckley; Miss Parker, Virginia Chester; General Taylor, Jack Jeffers; Doctor, Barney Furry.

KLEINE'S CINES AND ECLIPSE RELEASES.

George Kleine's schedule of releases for the week ending November 16, offers a program of interesting and pleasing variety consisting of a splendid war drama, a three subject topical reel, and a heart interest drama of especial excellence.

The first, "On The Firing Line" depicts an exciting military story interwoven among actual scenes of the Italian-Turkish War. The public never tires of these war films, and will especially appreciate the opportunity of witnessing genuine action. The plot of the drama is simple and is a charming contrast to the scenes of the conflict. It describes the adventures of Colonel Sandor and his orderly who leave their pleasant home in Italy and embark with the army for Tripoli. There, the Colonel, who is a brave and able officer, leads his regiment to a glorious victory against the Turkish forces and wins great renown for his generalship and bravery. After the battle, the Colonel, with his faithful follower returns to his home where they receive a warm welcome from the Colonel's little daughter who is very proud of them both. The scenes of the conflict are extremely realistic and will hold the spectators spellbound. The film is a feature and will do credit to any program.

The Wednesday Eclipse releases "Reviewing French Troops by Airship" shows remarkable views of French army maneuvers and glimpses of the city of Paris taken from a dirigible. The photography is above criticism and every detail of the dwellings in the city is wonderfully brought out. The reel is completed by two interesting topical subjects.

The Saturday Cines release entitled "The Old Actor's Vision" is an extremely artistic piece of work. It describes the experiences of an old actor who has fallen into distress and when kind friends make him comfortable, he slowly sinks into a reverie and has vision after vision of his former triumphs upon the stage.

The reel is completed by a travelogue entitled "Life and Industries in Aden Campo," which spreads before us places of interest in and about the town and several delightful views of the picturesque bay.

INTERESTING THANHOUSER MOMENTS.

Two young men start out on their business careers at the same age, but one begins at the top of the ladder, since he is a scion of wealth, and the other begins at the bottom. The latter has naught to recommend him but his ability. Ability, however, wins out. Dissipation loses the man at the top his high place and he slowly but surely tumbles down the ladder. The poor but able "bottom-man" goes up the ladder rung by rung, until at the top he meets and wins the girl shown in the accompanying cut. The reel is aptly called "The Ladder of Life" and was released Nov. 5th.

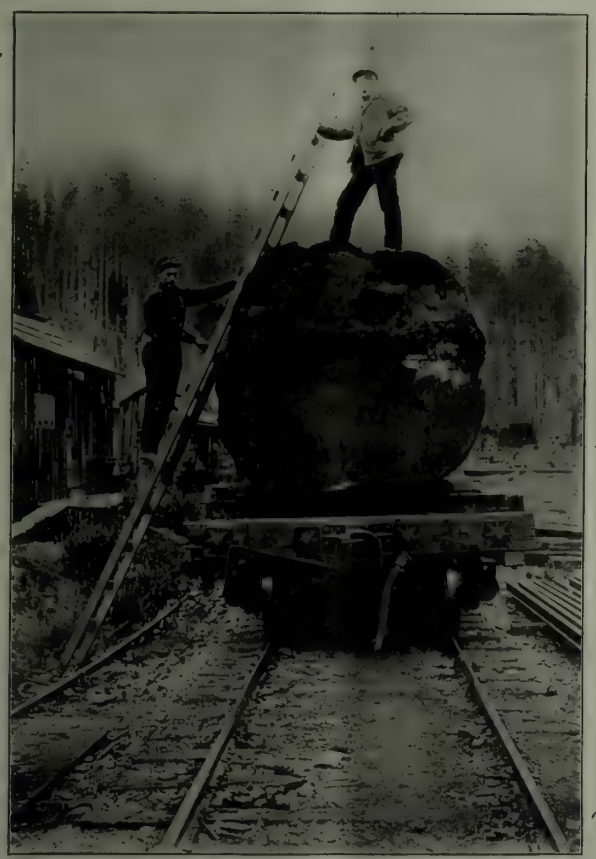
Scene from "Frankfurters and Quail" (Thanhouser).

The other scene is from "Frankfurters and Quail," released by Thanhouser Sunday, Nov. 17th. It shows a young couple who have inherited a vast fortune leaving the ancestral home they had just taken possession of—for Coney Island, where they will indulge in frankfurters and toboggan slides, which are undignified, but better fun than life in a mansion!

"Cutting California Redwoods" Essanay

Reviewed by Jas. S. McQuade.

JESSE ROBBINS, one of Essanay's special camera men, has secured a most interesting and valuable educational film, which will be released Nov. 14, under the title, "Cutting California Redwoods." There is something about these great giants of the forest that impresses one with a feeling of awe and veneration; and when it is recollected that they had raised their lofty heads hundreds of years before Israel toiled in Egypt, we cannot forbear to view their felling as an act of sacrilege. The U. S. government, however, has provided against the extinction of the great redwood forests and the scenes shown in this film are on private property and not on the reservation.



A Redwood Log on Flat Car (Essanay).

We arrive at the great lumber camp by train and are at once conducted to a monster tree, 360 feet in height and 14 feet in diameter, which has been selected for sacrifice. We watch the men as they make the undercut, which is done with such nice precision that the tree will fall along a certain line without striking other trees in its fall. The undercut finished, the men saw through the massive base from the opposite side. While the saw is still many inches away from the undercut, we see the huge bulk totter and the men seeking safety in flight. Down the giant falls with resounding crash, and the surrounding air is filled with dust and din.

The bark is then peeled off and the tree is cut into sections, after which the logs are yarded by means of a powerful bull donkey. Gravity is utilized in conveying the mighty logs to a main landing, where they are loaded on cars and taken to the mill pond. Here the railroad track is graded so that each car is tilted on the side away from the water, and men unload the logs with ease. As they fall into the pond, each weighing many tons, the water splashes high in the air and great waves resent the intrusion of the monsters.

SOME UNIVERSAL DOINGS.

From the coast word has been received at the new Universal quarters at 1600 Broadway, that Director Frank E. Montgomery has just produced one of the most realistic Bisons that has ever been turned out. It will be entitled "Big Rock's Last Stand," and it is said to be a thriller from start to finish.

Otis Turner has completed "A Red Man's Vengeance," which is going to attract a lot of attention.

The Powers California "kid" pictures will be released starting November 20. The first production will be entitled "The Leg and the Legacy," a full reel comedy, with Dave Wall and Elsie Albert and the two kids playing important parts. The two-reel production "Snow White," a fairy tale, will be released shortly. Both Mattie and Early, the two Powers' "kids," play leading parts.

Fritzi Brunette was presented with a beautiful loving cup by the members of the Powers company as a farewell token of appreciation. Miss Brunette will appear in the leading roles in Victor brand films hereafter. The cup was presented at a dinner given at the Hotel Astor.

On the coast, Director Montgomery has just finished a two-reel feature entitled "The Massacre of the Fourth Cavalry." There are several big pictures coming out under the 101-Bison trademark, which will be released in a very short time.

CHARLOTTE BURTON.

With the release entitled "The Would Be Heir," a new player will make her initial bow on the screen for the favor of the motion picture loving public. Miss Charlotte Burton, who has been engaged by Director Dwan to play opposite Jack Richardson in the heavy roles with the Western "Flying A" Company, while in the realm of "movies" is an old favorite in coast stock productions. For three seasons she starred in Theodore Kremer's production, "Buried at Sea," in which play she was supported by Mr. Orral Humphrey.

She was successful from the first and received many favorable criticisms from the press and public. One critic in reviewing her work writes, "Charlotte Burton, the leading lady, makes a very good impression. She is young and beautiful, with a superb figure, and reads her lines with cleverness. This girl will certainly succeed." While Miss Burton will invariably be cast in parts depicting intrigue and villainy, the public will no doubt welcome her as eagerly as they do that "Prince of Villains," Jack Richardson.

GAUMONT PICTURES MR. WILSON.

Doing the sister act with "The Land o' Cotton" the Gaumont release of November 9, will be the life of Woodrow Wilson. This film will show the birthplace of Mr. Wilson in old Virginia, his home at Princeton and the college over which he so long presided; the convention at Baltimore which nominated him, and the scenes of his notification of nomination at Sea Girt, N. J. The picture closes with a view of the White House.

"THE HORROR OF SIN" (Itala).

ITALA'S first regular release under its present representation in this country will be of one reel "boiled down" from two. This means that the best has been retained; and the result is a picture of strong quality. The story is essentially Continental, but nevertheless it will be followed with marked interest in this country. The underlying theme is the fear of a father that a taint of an unfaithful mother may have descended to the daughter.

The story opens with the daughter seated in a beautiful garden, reading a romance. As she reads she hears voices in the near distance. She goes to the balcony and leans over; she sees a boy and a girl romping and indulging in a bit of lovemaking. The father, unseen by his daughter, has been closely observing the girl's face. He picks up the book, notes its character, and takes the girl into the house, where he tells her a story of her mother. The screen portrays the tale of the man to the girl. The time of its occurrence was in her babyhood.

Scene from "The Horror of Sin" (Itala).

An automobile drives up to the mansion we have already seen. Right here is a little anachronism. In the babyhood of this full-grown girl there were in existence no such machines. However, as the father of the girl steps from this machine he sees climbing from a window of the house a man. The father draws a pistol and fires at the escaping figure. He misses. On entering the house he tells his wife she cannot remain under his roof. The wife goes out. The scene reverts to the father and daughter. The next picture is of the mother, of the present day, surrounded by a group of admirers. She reads from a newspaper of the death of her husband. She decides to go to her daughter. Her hilarious companions are of the party.

After a long automobile ride the mother finds the daughter. She introduces to her one of the men in the party. The latter makes violent love on short acquaintance, and is rebuked by the mother. The daughter is fascinated. She sees, however, a vision of her father and is reminded of his fears. Deciding that death is preferable to wrongdoing, she throws herself over the balcony and is killed. The final scene is a vision of the father blessing the daughter.

"TANAGRA"—A PICTURE THEATER FEATURE.

At the Fair, Frank Samuels' picture theater on Fourteenth Street, may be seen a clever illusion that is well adapted to be employed as a feature in picture theaters. Just how this illusion is worked it is not necessary to be explained. If convenient drop into the Fair and look it over. You will find it interesting; possible you may be able to secure it for your own house.

REGARDING MOTIOGRAPH'S EASTERN QUARTERS.

We are advised by the Eastern Manager of the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co. that even with the loss of interest in business, due to the temporary interest in the election of a President, that business with them is opening up in considerable volume. Their new offices are now about ready for the reception of visitors, and those calling will find Mr. Fred A. Clark, the manager, ready and willing to fully demonstrate the Motiograph machine, of which he has on display a full and complete line of the several equipments comprising the 1913 line.

A good sized shipment of machines, repair parts and accessories has arrived from the Chicago factory, and orders, either for machines or parts can, be filled promptly. Attention is called to the advertisement of the company which occupies a full page in this issue of our paper.

THE LIFE AND DEATH OF LIEUTENANT PETROSINO.

The Feature Photo Play Co., of 145 West 45th Street, is about to release 3,500 feet of film, purporting to portray the life and adventures of the Italian-American detective Petrosino, who is believed to have met his death at the hands of assassins in Palermo, Sicily, where he had gone to track down some criminals. Parts of the reels are interesting and exciting. The story of the film makes the alleged machinations of the so-called Black Hand Society its most prominent feature and there are many blood-curdling scenes in showing the workings of that mysterious band of the underworld. The man who has taken the part of Petrosino is a clever actor and enters into his part with reckless enthusiasm. The photography is good.

"THE QUEEN OF THE GYPSIES" (Eclair, 3 Reels).

This feature shows many of the characteristics and novel points, which made other productions of the Eclair company, such as "Zigomar" and "Tom Butler" so popular with the exhibitors. The film is sensational all the way through and brimful of action, but nowhere does it overstep the bounds of either decency or probability. Some of the incidents shown are startling, notably the picture of the fleeing queen as it appears reflected under the water. The outdoor settings are in many places superb and lend a fine air of realism to the action and to all the minor episodes. The contrast and the perpetual war between the nomadic gypsies and the old settlers is shown with great skill. The plot is interesting and its development is handled with cleverness. The spectator is kept in suspense to the last scene, which brings a fine climax, the disappearance of the queen in the night. A battle with half-wild bulls is one of the features of the film.

NEW HALLBERG DEVICE.

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, known by exhibitors generally as the "Economizer Man," comes forward now with the announcement that he has invented a device that beats the economizer a mile. He calls the new invention the "rectifier-economizer" and makes the claim for it that it will a.c. to d.c. with better effect for picture purposes and that it costs considerably less.

One feature of the new device is that it can be used in connection with Kinemacolor pictures where high amperage is a necessity, and will give a better light under all conditions.

We will not undertake to tell you all about the "Rectifier-Economizer," but would advise you to write to Mr. Hallberg for a full description and instructions for placing your order. It is worth your while to learn about this new invention.

THE KID AND KIDLET AGAIN.

The Young Thanhouserites have their inning in "Cross Your Heart," a drama released Friday, Nov. 22nd. In this are the Thanhouser Kid, the Kidlet, and Leland Benham, the bright seven-year-old son of Harry Benham, the popular Thanhouser player. In the story, little Leland is about to steal some chickens from a farmer, but is restrained by the farmer's children—the Kid and the Kidlet—who make him swear, "I promise never to steal, cross my heart." Later in life the thought of the promise saves the lad from prison.

"THE COUNTRY BOY" (Pathe).

A good strong story, well acted, is to be released by Pathe on November 20th, entitled "The Country Boy." Betty Gray, after being graduated from college is in poor health and her solicitous father sends her to Montana to recuperate at the ranch of his old friend Tom Stanton. When Betty reaches the farm Bob Stanton, who is acting as superintendent of his father's ranch, is appointed a Committee of One to see that Betty enjoys her vacation. After two months time Betty is in glowing good health. She has learned the value of outdoor exercise and also she has learned to love her handsome young tutor, but must now return to her home. Bob bids her an affectionate farewell, secretly longing to go with her to the city of which he has heard so much.

Scene from "The Country Boy" (Pathe).

A few weeks without her cheering presence is enough to convince Bob that he is madly in love, so he starts for the Big Town. In due course he passes the examination and is appointed a city fireman. While Betty is visiting her father's office one day the building takes fire and she finds herself hemmed in on all sides by the flames. The firemen arrive and make their way into the burning building. The first to penetrate the stifling smoke is Bob Stanton. He finds the unconscious Betty and gathering her in his arms he gropes his way to the street amid the cheers of the spectators. The valiant work of the fire laddies soon gives them the upper hand and the fire is subdued and finally quenched It is then that Bob learns the identity of the girl he has rescued. He calls at Betty's home some days later with a diamond ring, a very acceptable gift.

The film has plenty of exciting incidents and the romantic love story is very nicely interwoven. It will be released on November 20th.

GREAT NORTHERN FEATURES.

The Great Northern Company is about to release three features of considerable interest in the near future. The first and perhaps the most remarkable of the three is the "Fire at Sea." It is a wonderful exhibition of realism and brings the horrors of such a tragedy most vividly before the eyes of the spectator. There is stirring action all through this film and the scenes which show the fire and the hurried flight of the panic stricken passengers is a marvel of realism. A feature of a different type, but very charming and fascinating, is the three-reel subject, "Vanquished." It is the story of a somewhat wanton and frivolous, but very handsome and captivating woman, who resists with true feminine willfulness the advances of an ardent suitor. Like the ladies of old she asks her admirer for all kinds of proof to show his courage and devotion and he is equal to them all. Thrill succeeds thrill and the interest grows with every minute. When the hoydenish maiden at last yields her consent to the man who has risked so much for her, the audience breaks into delighted applause.

Another three-reel feature is "The Lost Memory." The same standard of dramatic power and acting is maintained in this subject, which treats the idea of the lost memory in an entirely novel and pleasing manner. The film is full of heart interest and quickly enlists the sympathy as well as the interest of an audience.

A CLEVER ECLAIR "SPLIT REEL."

Thursday, November 21st, Eclair will release one of the very best split reels it has yet produced. Both good, clever and laughable stories. Both easily understood, action is all logical and so, natural. In the first subject "The Black Hand," Miss Julia Stuart, Mr. F. Jamison, Mr. A. Ellery and Miss Baring all contribute their very best acting toward putting over a most novel, human trait plot.

To many people that title suggests a tragedy with pistols firing, knives flashing and bombs roaring, but to those who see this picture, those three words will forever after mean a hearty laugh. Mr. Bodkens reads an account in the paper of different people receiving black hand letters, and warnings; to him it is a joke until one of his fellow clerks impresses on him the fact that they really are dangerous and mention that even he, Bodkens, is liable to receive one.

Bodkens is a trifle nervous when he arrives home, and finding an imprint of a black hand on his door jamb does not help matters. Added to this when he and his wife and four friends sit down to dinner, and the hand once more appears this time on the table cloth, his consternation is complete.

The search for the owner of the hand and the final finding of him are amusingly shown and must be seen to be enjoyed.

In the second subject we again discover Miss Stuart in the main role. She is a most accomplished artist and we wonder why Eclair doesn't use her more often as a central figure.

Scene from "Mother's Bank Roll" (Eclair).

Mother (Miss Stuart) hides her bank roll in the kitchen stove. Father finds it and thinking it a very unsafe place he takes it to her daughter's room. Daughter discovers it and rehides it in her brother's room. Brother locates it and stuffs it in the piano. Movers arrive and take away the piano.

Now cook starts a fire in the stove, and mother arrives and in terror over the burning up of her bank roll fairly tears the top of the stove off, only to discover money gone. Father enters in time to save mother from fainting over her loss, for he tells her the money is safe. But he finds it gone from his hiding place. And so the action continues until they all overhaul the piano-movers and recover the "bankroll."

News and Views of Houses Here and There

TURNER & DAHNKEN BUILDING NEW HOUSE.
Ground-Breaking Exercises Attended by City Officials and Prominent Photoplay Men.

WE reproduce herewith a halftone of the architect's wash-drawing of the San Jose Theater, San Jose, California, which is being built by Messrs. Turner & Dahnken, who operate a chain of photoplay and vaudeville houses along the Pacific coast. Just preceding the ground-breaking exercises, which took place on Monday, September 30th, preliminary remarks were made by Mayor Thomas Monohan, of San Jose, in the course of which he said: "We are breaking ground for a new building. It is a building to be devoted to the entertainment of the public by the exhibition of wholesome and elevating pictures and shows accompanied by good music. Such an event is important because it replaces the old with the new, but more than all it is important because it will afford another place where the young people of our city can find innocent amusement, where their hours of relaxation may be occupied with pleasures that elevate to the exclusion of the attractions of the dance halls and poolrooms."

Mr. W. L. Atkinson, vice-president of the San Jose Chamber of Commerce, and O. Kehrlein, manager of the Empire Photoplay theater, of San Jose, also made speeches, Mr. Kehrlein officiating as master of ceremonies. Motion pictures were taken of the event by the Essanay Company which will be shown in all the Turner & Dahnken houses.

San Jose Theatre.

The measurements of the theater are 81 feet by 138 feet and the location is on South First street, one block from the center of the city. The structure is to be of steel and concrete, seating 1000 in the main auditorium and 750 in the balcony. The operator's booth is situated at the rear of the orchestra floor and is on a level with the screen. By this method twenty seats are lost, but the management claims that it enables them to get projection that defies comparison.

The exterior and interior scheme of decorations will follow the Italian Renaissance, and has been carefully worked out by Mr. L. Suckert who does all the decorative work for the Turner & Dahnken houses. It is the intention of the manager to show nothing but first run pictures. However, there will be a stage fully equipped for any vaudeville or other performance that may be presented. The appointments of the house are up to date and a $15,000 organ made by Skinner & Company will be installed. As in all the houses under the management of Messrs. Turner & Dahnken, this is the only means of providing music for their audiences. When the building is completed it will have involved an expenditure of over $130,000.

$25,000 PICTURE HOUSE AT LEWISTON, IDAHO.

Mr. William Burford, of Lewiston, Idaho, opened in the latter part of October, a moving picture theater costing $25,000 in that city.

Isis Theatre.

THE ISIS THEATER, PERU, IND.

The above halftone is a picture of the Isis Theater, Peru, Indiana, of which Mr. J. K. Lipsett is the manager. The house can seat 375. Nothing but Licensed service is used, for which an admission price of five cents is charged.

W. R. Bricker, of Philadelphia, Pa., will soon begin the erection of a new moving picture theater on the north side of Spruce Street, that city.

Plans are being prepared for a new theater building in Newark, N. J.

Olympic Theatre, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

PICTURE HOUSE OPERATED BY A WOMAN.

Miss Flo Peddycord is the manager, proprietor and machine operator at the theater of which we print a cut herewith and which is located at Buchanan, Michigan. Miss Peddycord has been in the moving picture business for the last seven or eight years, as cashier, manager, singer and operator, and is now the owner of a little picture show in the small town of Buchanan. She has an Edison machine and says that she reads the Moving Picture World thoroughly every week.

The Bell Theatre.

Salvi Ciriconni, of South Bethlehem, Pa., is building a moving picture theater on Broadway, that city. It is expected to be open shortly.

THE ELLEN THEATER, PROVO, UTAH.

The Ellen Theater, of Provo, Utah, is a $10,000 picture house. It seats 325 persons. Four reels of Licensed film, changed three times a week, constitute each performance. There are installed in the projection room two No. 5 Power's machines. Mr. John B. Ashton, who is the manager of the Princess Theater, is also the manager of the Ellenville. The house opens at 11 a.m. and closes at 11:30 p.m.

Ellen Theatre.

The Broad Theater, of South Bethlehem, Pa., which was opened last May, is doing a capacity business. Four reels of Licensed films is shown for admission prices of five and ten cents.

Varieties Theatre.

VARIETIES THEATER OF TERRE HAUTE, IND.

We print herewith a half-tone of the Varieties Theater of Terre Haute, Ind., which plays vaudeville and pictures from September to June. For years past the house was dark during the summer months, but this year the manager kept moving pictures running from June to September with much success. A large number of the feature films now on the market were run and mostly all the Bison and other Independent features were booked for two and three days. "The extra expenditure for the features," said the manager of the Varieties, "was greatly offset by the increase in the box office receipts."

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ENGLAND.

A SPECIAL exhibition of the moving pictures of the Olympic Games was given at Tremont Temple, Boston, on the evening of Monday, Oct. 28. Admission ranged from five cents to one dollar, and the performance was for the benefit of the Swedish Charitable Society. Singing and musical numbers were also on the program.

If anyone, especially General Manager Lurie, tries to tell you that his Beacon Theater, Boston, is not doing a smashing big business, just refer him to the writer. On Monday, October 21, we passed by the theater and found fifty people waiting. This happened at 3:15 p. m., and as the Beacon seats 800, it can readily be seen that the house is doing "some business." The Beacon is one of the finest theaters in the country, has the location, and delivers the goods in the shape of first-run licensed films, and a good grade of vaudeville.

Mr. George Curran, stage manager for the Boston Grand Opera House, is giving Sunday night concerts at the St. James Theater, Boston. The programs consist of vaudeville and pictures, and the first concert was given on October 27. The St. James gives stock-company attractions during the week. The house is in the residential section, and Manager Curran found business very good at his initial performance.

Manager Jones of the Huntington Avenue Theater, Boston, has secured a license to open on Sunday evenings, and the first performance was given on October 27. This house is in the residential district, close by to the new St. James Theater, but there seemed to be enough business for both, and Mr. Jones reports himself as being satisfied.

Mr. Sam Messing is now installed as manager of Marcus Loew's South End Theater, Boston. Vaudeville has again been made a part of the programs, and an effort is being made to get the South End into the money-making class again. Former Manager Weiss of the South End, has been transferred to Loew's other Boston house, the Orpheum, where he acts as assistant to Manager Victor Morris.

A new corporation is the Puritan Special Features Company of Portland, Maine. This is a $2,000 corporation, and the promoters are: Eben W. Freeman, W. M. Walls and Charles M. Drummond, all of Portland.

The Dreamland Theater, Beverly, Mass., certainly gets a great deal of free publicity, with the aid of President Taft. On October 21, President Taft entertained 15 Massachusetts Mayors, and at a moving picture theater moving pictures were shown of President Taft's reception at Beverly, July 4. The president watched himself sitting on the veranda of his summer home and speaking from the rear of his private car at Worcester, Mass. Moving pictures were also shown of Miss Helen Taft and Robert Taft, during their trip to the Glacier National Park.

The Yale Moving Picture Company of New Haven, Conn., secured the Tingue Opera House, Seymour, Conn., and renovated it into a photoplay theater. The house has been renamed the Seymour Opera House. Business is reported as good.

On Wednesday, October 23, the first free exhibition of moving pictures was given in the East Boston and Charlestown high schools. This is directly under the control of the city of Boston, and was given for mothers only. Moving pictures were shown calculated to instruct mothers how to nurse, feed, clothe and how to bring up children generally. The pictures were explained by Director R. E. Hawley. On Friday, a series of free moving pictures were shown for men. This is the start of a regular series of similar free exhibitions, and surely is a great point gained for motography as an educational factor.

The Premier Theater, Boston, Exhibited the three-reel Milan feature, "St. George and the Dragon," October 24-26. The reels were heavily advertised in the Boston dailies, and did a good business for the Premier.

Evidently the most exclusive Boston society is to take up moving pictures as an entertainment. This statement is based on the fact that the Copley-Plaza Hotel, Boston's newest and most expensive hotel, advertises a special dinner on election night, November 5. Moving pictures are to be given, to accompany a $5 per cover table d'hote!

The Newton, Mass., Opera House, corner of Pearl and Centre Streets, announced that vaudeville is now included in the programs, in addition to the regular bills of moving pictures and illustrated songs. Pictures are changed Monday, Wednesday and Friday. A sacred concert is given every Sunday evening, with a change of program. The Newton Opera House is open every evening, and on Tuesday, Friday and Saturday afternoons. Admission is all the way from 5 to 25 cents. No difficulty is experienced in filling the theater regularly.

A new corporation is the Slepack Amusement Company of New Haven, Conn. This is a $10,000 corporation, with Mr. M. Slepack as president and general manager. The concern is to have a first-class, fireproof theater, devoted to moving pictures and vaudeville, at 841 Chapel Street, New Haven. The Comique Theater, another moving picture house of that city, is now operated by Mr. Slepack, and does an excellent business.

It is up to Providence, R. I., exhibitors, to watch out lest they be victimized by the well-meaning, but thoroughly ill-directed zeal of their local ministers. There is at present a well-defined movement on foot among the Providence clergy to maintain a self-appointed censorship over moving picture films and theaters. Judging from the past performances of these worthy gentlemen along similar lines, it is very possible that they will cause a lot of unjust restrictions to be placed over the moving picture houses. The Providence clergy are dead against any Sunday opening of theaters, and are now about to busy themselves in an attempt to gain their wishes. Rhode Island exhibitors must organize against this possibility, and create public opinion in their favor.

J. J. Burk, manager of the Boston branch of the United Vaudeville Booking Offices, is to return to New York headquarters, and J. E. Clifford will take charge of the Boston end of things.

Barre, Vt., is at present entertaining an outbreak of small-pox, and the local board of health has had all theaters, schools and churches closed, until such time as it shall seem wise to allow public places to reopen.

Dorchester, Mass., is slated for a moving picture and vaudeville theater, which will be located on Dorchester Avenue. An 800-hundred-seat house is planned, and one that shall be modern and thoroughly fireproof. Offices and possibly a store, will also be erected on the property.

Joseph Rotchford states that he has persuaded the town of Hamden, Conn., to grant him a license to operate a moving picture theater in that city. This is quite a stunt for Mr. Rotchford, as Hamden has never before seen its way clear to grant a license for this purpose. Mr. Rotchford is building a neat, cosy house, which will soon be ready for its opening.

Manager E. D. Eldridge of the Hyperion Theater, New Haven, Conn., exhibited the reels of the Paul Rainey African Hunt, October 24-26. Business was very good during this engagement at the theater, which usually presents high-class road attractions.

Boylen's Theater, Taunton, Mass., is now nearly ready, and surely will be one of the finest moving picture and vaudeville theaters in the city when finished.

Mr. Moe Mark, owner of the Comique Theater, Lynn, Mass., was visiting that city recently. Mr. Mark is usually in Buffalo, N. Y., where he is building an Eagle theater. Mr. Mark is most fortunate in having so able and faithful a man to manage his Comique Theater as Mr. Al. Newhall.

Mr. A. Raccio of New Haven, Conn., intends to have a moving picture theater in New Haven, and has selected Whalley Avenue as the best location. This is not in the business district, but the house has a large territory from which to draw its patrons.

HENRY.

LOUISVILLE.

HOPKINS Theater, Market Street near Second, Louisville, has been taken over by Louis J. Dittmar, manager of the Majestic Theater, and the house will be opened in the near future, with Kinemacolor films and features. The enterprise is a new one in every respect, and a new company will be incorporated to conduct the theater. Hopkins, up to last spring, was operated by the Princess Amusement Co., with vaudeville and moving pictures. Extensive improvements will be made in the theater before it is reopened, but these will be rushed through and the place will be ready for the public in November. Admission prices will be five and ten cents, the former being the balcony fee. It is generally believed that the new enterprise will be a success under the new regime, as Kinemacolor pictures have not been fully exploited in the Kentucky metropolis.

Caufield & Shook, a Louisville firm of photographers, will shortly begin the manufacture of films showing scenes in and around Louisville. The necessary equipment has been ordered and work will begin shortly, all sights of interest to be photographed.

Work on the new National Theater, to be erected at Fifth and Walnut Streets, will begin about December 1, according to a recent announcement by George A. Epstean, head of the Detroit syndicate which has the project in hand. The work of clearing the site will begin at once. The National Theater will probably run both vaudeville and moving pictures.

Officers of the Young Men's Christian Association in various eastern Kentucky towns are depending on moving pictures in checking gambling and drinking tendencies among miners and timber-workers in that section. Practically every town in the mining and timber district is now equipped with a Y. M. C. A. moving picture theater.

The Needham Amusement Co. has been incorporated at Pineville, Ky., a coal mining center. The capitalization is $1,000, the incorporators being J. A. Needham, A. G. Patterson and M. A. Bean. The company will erect a small motion picture theater.

Shobers Brothers, of Cincinnati, Ohio, have taken out a permit for the erection of a moving picture house at 4023 Eastern Avenue, at a cost of $1,000. The structure will be of concrete, one story in height.

Michael Switow, president of the Falls Cities Amusement Co., of Louisville, will shortly invade Indianapolis, believing that that city will support a big, high-class motion picture theater. Mr. Switow is planning the erection of a house with a seating capacity of between 1,200 and 1,500. A balcony will be a feature, according to his present ideas. Mr. Switow recently looked over the field, and is now negotiating for several locations. Work will begin as soon as the Louisville magnates secure a site which meets his requirements.

The Advance Film Manufacturing Co., of Louisville, recently took pictures of the auto races which were held at Churchill Downs.

Louisville moving picture exhibitors are contemplating the installation of ballot boxes in their houses, with tickets to decide whether or not the public favors vaudeville and vocal offerings in connection with vaudeville. The question is a much debated one, and the proposed plan seems to be the only feasible and effective method of settling the dispute. Blanks are to be printed and distributed, asking for an expression of the patrons' views. The ballots will then be dropped into the box, and at the end of a certain time all will be counted and sentiment ascertained accordingly. The majority of the exhibitors now believe that neither vaudeville nor singing is essential, nor a great aid to success in a moving picture theater.

PHILADELPHIA.

A MOVING picture theater is to be built at the northeast corner of Locust and 60th Streets, on a plot of ground that has just been sold by John C. Knox, real estate broker. The theater will be of fire-proof construction, and will seat 2,200 persons.

Under a sweeping order issued by Public Safety Director Bartlett, eight moving picture houses in Atlantic City have been closed, including those on the Steel and Steeplechase Piers, as they are in frame buildings. All will remain closed until the buildings are put in such shape as will warrant them safe.

Sigmund Lubin, the moving picture capitalist, accompanied by his son, called upon the new Superintendent of Police Robinson, and after congratulating him upon his promotion as head of the City Police department, handed him a check for $100, to be applied to the Police Pension Fund.

Notice has been filed by the Continental Film Exchange of Philadelphia, for articles of corporation under the laws of the state of Pennsylvania. The promoters of the new company are: Arthur Lucas, C. Alma Blitz and R. N. Kellam. Besides having the exchange end of the business they will also handle the leading projection machines and parts with all the necessary supplies.

W. H. Amer passed through Philadelphia on his way to Shamokin, where he will take pictures of that city under the management of the Gaumont Company.

A permit was granted a few days ago to demolish the buildings which are on the site of the new theater to be erected in the neighborhood of Frankford Avenue and Cedar Street, where a $100,000 store and theater building will afford the people of that section the best form of amusement.

One of the most novel ideas for the handling of large crowds at the ticket windows, is the automatic ticket seller at the Family Theater on Market Street. The patron places the money on the window rack, and the cashier, by pressing her foot on a pedal, causes a ticket to appear on the change desk. It is estimated that three times the number of tickets may be handled by this method, over the old way of tearing them off the rool, as formerly done.

In the political world of Philadelphia, Mr. Edward Krauppa is causing some stir by his good work. The Monarch Film Exchange, one of the oldest in the city, is one of the busiest places that a person could want to see, and this is all through the untiring efforts of Mr. Krauppa.

One of the most recent incorporations in the moving picture line to take place, is that of the Fairmount Feature Company of Camden, N. J., with a capital of $12,000. I. C. Clow, of No. 419 Market street, Camden, N. J., is at the head of the company.

Application has been made by William R. Bricker for a permit to build a theater on the North side of Spruce street above Sixtieth street at a cost of $7500. It will seat 480 persons and measures 40 x 100 feet.

Moving picture men and theater managers were somewhat surprised to hear of the wedding of William W. Miller, of the Penn and Plaza Theaters to Miss Louise Marie Homberg, which took place on October 17th.

Members of the select and common councils of Philadelphia were shown how mosquitos were bred, in the different parts of the city, a few days ago by a series of moving pictures. Pictures were also shown how other cities are trying to stamp them out.

The Smith-Hardican Company is estimating on plans for the remodeling of the market house at 26th and Girard avenue, so that it can be used as a moving picture house. The alterations will cost about $40,000.

The New Palace theater of Allentown, Pa., one of the finest picture houses in that valley, opened a few days ago under the management of Manley and Roxbury.

Reading, Pa., is to have a new theater which will be erected on Front street between Green and Greenwich streets at a cost of $2,700.

Romaine Fielding, director for the Lubin Stock Company now stationed at Prescott, Ariz., has recently been appointed a deputy sheriff at that town. His position will give him greater advantages to secure films of thrilling outlaw life that the company is now working on.

The Heed Building, on Filbert Street, which had been the mecca for feature film exchanges for the past few months, is now devoid of this line of business. The city fire marshal and insurance men put up such a kick that it was necessary for the superintendent of the building to ask all the feature men to please vacate. These concerns, The Hill Feature Co., the International Feature Co., the Moyer Feature Co., the Pioneer Feature Co., the Warner Feature Co. and the Globe Feature Co., are all now in new quarters at 1202 Race Street. The building where they are now located contains nothing but feature men.

None of the 173 moving picture establishments throughout the city is violating the law by permitting the exits to be obstructed, according to a report submitted to Director Porter by Fire Marshal Lattimer of a general inspection made by himself and his staff of assistants recently. The inspection was under the personal supervision of Director Porter, and in a number of cases the director made the inspections himself, especially in West Philadelphia, and from every standpoint it was found that the local theaters were in the best of condition.

Arthur Hyman, of the Calehuff Supply Co., has just finished a very successful trip throughout the State and came back with a number of orders.

Reading seems to have a number of vacancies for moving picture houses, one called the Subway, which will be located at Church and Spring Streets, which will be opened before the holidays; the Star, located at 134 South Penn Street, has just opened its doors to the public, and is doing a rushing business, and according to some people in that section there still is room for others.

Several moving picture corporations of Philadelphia have had suits brought against them by District Attorney Swartley for having failed to place in the hands of the internal revenue collector a full statement of business done for the year 1911 on which to base the special excise tax. The time for filing these accounts expired in March, and under the act those failing to make returns are liable to a maximum penalty of $10,000 in each case.

CLEMENT H. CONGDON.

GRAND RAPIDS.

GRAND RAPIDS is rapidly developing as regards suburban motion picture houses. The latest outside theater to open is the Vaudette Theater, managed and owned by Mr. B. J. Hill, with a capacity of 150. Service is secured through the Anti-Trust Film Co., Grand Rapids, Mich., branch.

Another outlying theater is the Pastime, capacity 300, operated by Mr. T. A. Giles. The Pastime is said to be one of the best arranged in the State, complying more strictly to ventilation and requirements than the majority. The seats are upholstered and the house is extremely cozy.

Mr. Davis has completed the decorating of the Lyric and it looks very rich. The first film shown after the work was completed was "The Massacre of the Santa Fe Trail," which showed to large houses, afternoon and night. Big features are a strong specialty with Manager Davis.

The Orpheum is making a decided hit under the new 10 cent policy, four good vaudeville acts, a good orchestra and 3,000 feet of film make a bill worth while.

Nichols Bros., Inc., owners and managers of the Apollo and Superba Theaters are contemplating the installation of a modern electric lighting plant, independent of the city power. They figure on supplying power for several stores in the vicinity of the theaters as well as for their theaters. The Superba when completed in its new form will be one of the best lighted and decorated for its size in the State. Work is progressing nicely. It will be necessary to close the Superba for at least thirty days while re-modeling is going on.

Mr. F. L. Canine, the hustling manager of the Anti-Trust Film Company branch in Grand Rapids says the company has secured the State rights for Illinois, Indiana, and Wisconsin, for the Sarah Bernhardt pictures and is figuring on two other States. The Grand Rapids branch covers a circuit of West Michigan theaters located at Muskegon, and other good towns as well as a general service covering the entire western half of the State. Business is reported as being in splendid shape and Mr. Canine is most enthusiastic as regards the local field in opportunities for suburban and outlying theaters.

The General Film Exchange branch at Detroit, Mich., is under the effective management of Gillingham & Smith, and supplies the United Theaters of Grand Rapids, which are controlled by Gillingham & Smith. Both of these gentlemen are compelled to be on the road much of the time, though Mr. Gillingham devotes most of his time to Detroit, while Mr. Smith takes care of the western Michigan end of the business. Mr. Gillingham states that he is optimistic as concerns the outlook for winter business and that conditions are fine all over the extensive territory covered.

Mr. A. J. Gillingham has been in Grand Rapids, for several days looking after his interests among the United Theatres, which compose the licensed houses, and also in connection with affairs at the Columbia and Orpheum theatres. The new Sun bookings at the Orpheum were very satisfactory.

Mr. Paul Clayton, who is favored with a most excellent baritone voice, has started at the "Original." Mrs. Schreiber and Mrs. Schiedt, who formerly sang in the "Original" have gone to the Monroe, where they are making the same hit they did at the "Original."

The Columbia, of which Mr. Frank O'Donnell is the manager, has had a change of treasurers, Mr. Loyd Gallup resigning to go to Jackson, Mich. The former treasurer, under the Temple management has assumed charge. His many friends are glad to see Mr. Fred Harpster again at his old stand.

Mrs. Popelwhaite is singing at the Idle Hour in place of Mr. Deveaux who has gone to Chicago.

New Caille ticket boxes grace the entrance of the "Original," "Ideal" and "Idle Hour" theaters, having just been installed.

Roy W. Teevin's orchestra, enlarged, is furnishing the music at the Columbia this year, repeating the favorable impression made all last season at the Orpheum.

General Manager Breen of the United Theatres Company says he intends to present every feature on the Licensed release schedules as soon as it is possible to do so. He has always given the new stuff at an early date and this is a salient reason for the way the pictures fill the houses under his supervision.

The Superba Theater closed October 27, and will be dark for some thirty days while the re-building is under way. Work will be pushed as rapidly as possible.

The Selig Feature "Count of Monte Cristo," was run for two days at the Idle Hour. Usually only one day is given to any feature, but this film was a big winner and went strong both days at double admission price.

Mr. Fred Nicholls, of the Apollo, was ill with the grippe last week, but is now able to be back on duty.

HUGH KING HARRIS.

IN THE NORTHWEST.

MISS IRENE GORDON, who for the last year has operated a moving picture show in Granger, Washington, has reopened the Lois Theater in Grand View, which has been dark for six months.

A movement has been started at Bemidji, Minnesota, to have moving pictures censored by a local committee, following a suggestion by Governor Eberhardt. Thomas J. Burke of the Commercial Club, plans to have the city council appoint a board, composed of the city superintendent of schools, an alderman and a private citizen.

The Essanay Company took pictures at Minneapolis during "Made in Minneapolis" week. The State University grounds, the three newspaper offices, state and city officials, fire department, department stores, large factories and the parks and boulevards were included. A copy of the film is being used by the Minneapolis Civic and Commerce Association for aiding its convention bureau.

The city council of Moorhead, Minnesota, has passed an ordinance providing a license fee of $25 a year for moving picture shows.

Jacob Moelk of Stoughton, Wisconsin, has purchased the Erickson property on Main Street in that city, and will remove his Lyric Theater into it.

Moving picture theaters of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, co-operated with the Milwaukee Visiting Nurse Association in its biennial tag day, October 12. The slogan "Do Your Share" was shown in all the theaters. Films were also given showing the uplifting work of a visiting nurse.

Walter Gifford Smith, chairman of the Hawaiian promotion committee of Honolulu Chamber of Commerce, has been doing successful promotion work in the northwest with 3,000 feet of pictures. They were shown to the members of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce and were given as a paid Sunday evening lecture at the First Unitarian church in that city.

President C. R. Van Hise of the University of Wisconsin, at Madison, is said to have spoiled a plan for taking pictures of a freshman sophomore class rush which ended in a lake ducking stunt.

F. H. MADISON.

IN THE SOUTHWEST.

COMMISSIONER FRED BARTLETT, of Dallas, Texas, recently assigned two plain clothes officers to inspect the various moving picture shows in order to protect women from "mashers."

Moving pictures were recently made of convicts at work in the shops and on the farms at the Texas State Penitentiary at Huntsville. They will be preserved on the prison records and exhibited on special occasions.

The Rex Theater, of Nowata, Okla., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $2,100. The incorporators are A. A. Shilkett, Metta Shilkett and George B. Schwabe, all of Nowata.

Licensed pictures are being shown at the Majestic Theater at Madison, Wis., which has been converted into a moving picture show by Sherwood and McWilliams.

Friday night pictures at the Congregational Church in Appelton, Wis., will be entertaining and educational, while those which form a part of the Sunday night services will be religious.

The Bioscope Company of Austin Texas, took moving pictures recently of various phases of college life at Southwestern University, at Georgetown, Texas, for David Goodlet, proprietor of two Georgetown picture shows.

The Schick opera house at Plainview, Texas, has been sold by Dr. Ballard of Abilene, to E. M. Carter, James Heard and others. The house will be managed by Bonner and Tyrone.

A stock company has been formed at Beeville, Texas, with J. C. Dougherty as president, to manage the new opera house.

F. H. MADISON.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

MANAGER NOTES, of the Empress, has purchased the property adjoining the theater and intends to enlarge the seating capacity. The theater enjoys a good business; part of this success is due to the excellent music furnished with the pictures. The house is well ventilated, projection very good at all times and the indirect lighting system is used.

Tom Moore has taken charge of the old Imperial, a vaudeville house, changing its name to the Garden, and now shows only pictures.

The "Leader," a moving picture house under the able management of Miller Brothers, is doing an excellent business. The house is well ventilated and indirect lighting system used. The projection and music are perfect.

The Virginia has a front made entirely of mirrors. Mr. Alvine's activities are very much in evidence, judging by the amount of business this house is doing.

The Maryland is always playing to capacity audiences. Under the able management of Mr. John Dexter this house is fast becoming too small to accommodate its patrons. Mr. Dexter intends to enlarge it by converting a building on G Street into a theater, using the present Maryland as an entrance on Ninth Street, forming a complete L.

Mr. Mayer, the new manager of the General Film Company, reports excellent business. He always greets you with a pleasant smile. The company occupies an entire floor on the corner of Seventh and E Streets Northwest.

Mr. Mack, of the Mutual, reports business good and on the increase. He is always there with the "glad hand," doing everything in his power to please.

Excavation is well underhand for the erection of a new moving picture theater at the corner of North Capitol and H Streets Northeast.

The Mount Vernon, on Ninth Street, near New York Avenue, after having been closed for a year, has re-opened under the management of Mr. Coleman, who reports business very good.

H. A. JOHNSON.

OREGON.

MANAGER M. G. WINSTOCK of the Peoples' Amusement Co., has returned from a trip to Pendleton, where he has picked out two locations where the company intends to put up a $20,000 photoplay house. While at Pendleton, Mr. Winstock made special preparations for the Round-Up pictures, of which 4,000 feet will be shown throughout the country, this being sold only on the state rights plan. Mr. Winstock also visited Walla Walla, Wash., Colfax and Spokane, Wash., inspecting the company's theaters there.

S. J. Nelson is the new manager of the Arcade Theater in Portland, while Arthur Elwell has been made manager of the Sunnyside Theater.

The three suburban theaters of the Peoples' Amusement Co., the Sunnyside, Crystal and Tivoli, are thrown open each Sunday morning to various Sunday School and Church societies to meet therein. This has met with such great success that the suburban theaters of the company has had to date each society and church to meet on a different Sunday, thereby giving each a chance to hold its sessions in these beautiful theaters.

"Custer's Last Fight," the American masterpiece, has been booked for the Star Theater, Portland, and will be shown at a private exhibition to the Press Club.

A decision will be reached at the next Board of directors meeting of the Peoples' Amusement Co., which takes place next month, whether or not the alterations planned for the Star Theater, Portland, will be made or not. The contemplated alterations will cost approximately $25,000. This theater will have a unique front, which will represent a large shell, it having several entrances and crystalized walls.

The manager of the Star Theater of Medford, was a visitor in Portland last week.

A. Berg, manager of the Star Theater, Astoria, was granted a leave of absence by the Peoples' Amusement Co., for two months. Mr. Berg will visit his parents in England, and will resume his duties as manager again upon his return. Al. Cliff of San Francisco, will manage the house during his absence.

E. N. WEINBAUM.

ST. LOUIS.

BURTON HOLMES and his motion picture travelogues opened at the Odeon, Thursday, October 10th. Farther India, South America and the Panama Canal were some of the new subjects shown. The Isthmian Canal subjects were viewed with special interest here owing to the proposed legislation respecting the widening of the Mississippi River to the Gulf to further enhance St. Louis as a national distributing center.

Nat C. Goodwin and the famous motion pictures of Dickens celebrated "Oliver Twist" played to capacity houses at the Odeon the week of September 30th. James Newton Baskett lectured the films. Special school matinees were featured for the students of the great English author and his immortal character drawings of Fagin, Nancy and Bill Sykes.

That hustling moving picture and vaudeville impressario, Frank Talbot of the Gem and Hippodrome, put over another feature here last week when Mme. Sarah Bernhardt in "Queen Elizabeth," a four-reel production was shown at the Hippodrome, at popular prices. The pictures shown were the first production of the same, west of the Mississippi River.

The Gem Theater, formerly a ten cent house, is now showing licensed films and prices have been cut to five cents.

F. J. FEGAN.

IN THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

AT the request of Edward Worst, superintendent of the Joliet, Ill., city schools, Chief of Police DeMiller has issued an order commanding theater owners to keep boys out of their playhouses during school hours. Mrs. Margaret Arthur, truant officer, declares that the films were responsible for a good many absences from school.

L. B. Anderson, of San Antonio, Tex., has purchased the X-Ray Theater at Lincoln, Ill., and has opened it for business. The place which was recently owned by Sylvia & Swanland, of Springfield, Ill., was sold to satisfy a mortgage and was purchased by E. W. Bates, of Lincoln, Ill., when sold by Anderson.

The Central Christian Bible School of the Central Christian church of Peoria, Ill., has adopted moving pictures for a series of entertainments.

Burnstein & Evans, of Springfield, Ill., have opened a family moving picture theater in the Grace building, in North Market Street, at Marion, Ill. Two shows at five and ten cents will be given each evening. William Evans will be resident manager, having removed from Springfield to Marion.

The Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs has issued a bulletin asking the local clubs throughout Illinois to help the moving picture shows instead of condemning them. The request is as follows: "Again we call attention to the five and ten cent shows. They can be made a valuable aid to education. Have a theater committee appointed whose duties shall be to look after the lighting, ventilation, heating and films used. Talk over conditions with the managers. We believe they desire to please their patrons, but it is our business to see that these theaters are safe places for our children. All through the West during the summer months we found these theaters greatly patronized. The club women are active factors in the censorship of them. Why? Because they affect the health and morals of their children. Mrs. Zimmerman, chairwoman of the civic department of the General Federation, suggests the clubs through the local managers of picture shows, secure the educational film 'The Street Beautiful,' produced by the Edison Co. in co-operation with the civic department of the General Federation."

Harry Virden, of Chicago, used moving pictures at the seventeenth State Conference of Charities and Correction in Springfield, Ill., October 20, to demonstrate how he taught a blind, deaf and dumb boy to speak, read and write.

Nathan H. Hall, a member of the house of delegates at St. Louis, is preparing a censorship bill which provides that owners of houses must file their programs three days in advance so that they can be reviewed by the censors.

The Lyric Theater, at Villa Grove, Ill., was turned over to the local Lodge Knights of Pythias, October 22, to show a film depicting the lives of Damon and Pythias.

The LaSalle Enterprise Co., of LaSalle, Ill., has re-awarded the contract for its new theater to Noonan Brothers, of LaSalle, for $23,986.

The Lyon & Siegel Popular Photoplay Co., which operated an airdome at McHenry, Ill., last summer, are now giving shows in the Central Opera House and plan to include Richmond, Ill., in the circuit.

When a reporter asked Mayor John D. Couffer, of Wilmette, Ill., some of the municipal needs, he included among other things the photoplay. "There is another matter which is of great moment to our village," he said. "It is the question of public amusements. At present in Wilmette, we have not even a motion picture show. This is on account of the high prohibitive license of $10 a day demanded by our ordinance. Some years ago, when there were some objectionable features to this form of entertainment, a high license was deemed wise. Now that the tone of the moving picture has so improved in character, and event possesses great educational advantages, I should be glad to have such an entertainment in Wilmette. Our young people now go elsewhere for an evening's enjoyment and such money as they spend on amusement should be retained in their home village. I would, of course, have such an entertainment only of the highest possible grade and character."

A new moving picture show will be opened in Power's Building, at Grayville, Illinois.

Mrs. Rilda Smith and Mrs. Susan Davis, of Indianapolis, Indiana, have been arraigned in the Juvenile Court, charging with neglect of their children in permitting their daughters, twelve and eleven years old, respectively, to sing in moving picture theaters.

Charges recently were filed against Marsden Duncan, proprietor of Dreamland Theater, at Streator, Illinois, alleging that he over crowded his house in violation of the local ordinance.

Prescott & McLain are giving Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday night moving picture shows in Grammer's Opera House, at Baylis, Ill.

The Eden Theater Company, of Chicago, have been incorporated with a capital stock of $2,000, to do a moving picture and theatrical business. The incorporators are: Lee H. Fleming, Frank E. Newman and John R. McCabe.

The Federal Feature Film Supply Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $5,000, to manufacture and deal in moving picture films. The incorporators are: Ella Graham, R. J. Cupler and Nathan S. Schoenbrod.

America's Feature Film Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $50,000, to do a general moving picture and theatrical business. The incorporators are: Hulen H. Hood, Ernest J. Sichenlaus and Herbert W. Lawrence.

The LaSalle Enterprise Company, of LaSalle, Illinois, has voted to increase its capital stock from $25,000 to $50,000.

Charles J. Law has leased the Grand Opera House, in Pana, Ill., and now has charge of three theaters.

Lawrence Higbee and D. Harvey have opened a new picture house to be known as the Princess, at Wyoming, Illinois.

The new theater at Highland, Ill., has been opened.

A stock company has been formed by twelve young men of Raymond, Ill., to manage the opera house in that city.

Twenty-five merchants of Olney, Ill., have united to attract trade to town, by giving a ticket to a picture show with every twenty-five-cent purchase made on Saturday.

Robert Jones has purchased the opera house at Roodhouse, Ill.

W. S. Bury has leased the Majestic Theater, at Mattoon, Ill., and taken charge of it, succeeding Marcus Heimam, who has been in charge for four years. The policy under the new management will be exclusively pictures.

The Erber Amusement Company, of East St. Louis, Ill., which has been incorporated with a capital stock of $20,000, plans to enlarge the Avenue Theater, making the balcony extend to the side-walk and put in a new lobby. Mrs. Sadie Urber is president; Harry Carpenter, treasurer, and Joseph Urber, manager. B. Dare is another incorporator.

The Standard Theaters Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated with a capital stock of $15,000, to operate theaters, opera houses and other places of amusement. The incorporators are: Herschel L. Vallandigham, Fred H. McMillan and Alexander Smietanks.

Jack Stern, of Decatur, Ill., has purchased a half-interest in the Illinois Theater, at Newman, Ill., and the business will be conducted by the firm of Root & Stern. The location has been changed to the Masonic Temple and a complete new outfit purchased.

Manager Miller, of the Princess Theater, at Woodstock, Ill., is adding fifty feet to the length of his theater.

The city council of Champaign, Ill., has decided that unless a court holds that the question is one of public policy, residents of the city will not be allowed to vote upon the proposition to have Sunday performances.

Fletcher Trumpy, of Havana, Ill., has accepted a position as cornetist in the orchestra at the Vaudette Theater, South Fifth Street, Springfield, Ill.

Health Officer, S. G. Mengle, of Peru, Ill., has recommended to the city council that moving picture theaters in that city be forbidden to attempt to take more than their seating capacity. In addition to the danger from fire, he says it is impossible to properly ventilate a theater with such crowds.

The Jefferson Company, of Fort Wayne, Ind., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $25,000, to purchase and hold theaters. The directors are: Austin W. Stults, Alfred L. Randall and Sprague Green.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Mattoon, Ill., has taken steps to present a resolution to the city council, asking that Sunday shows be prohibited.

W. A. Clark, of Upper Alton, Ill., has commenced the construction of a building to be occupied by a moving picture show which will be financed by an Alton syndicate.

Ralph W. Tippetts, formerly manager of the Empress and Crescent moving picture theaters, at Peoria, Ill., but more recently treasurer of the Young Buffalo Wild West Show, has become manager of the Vaudette Theater, at the corner of State and Randolph Streets, Chicago. The house is one of four owned by Colonel Vernon C. Seaver, who also owns the Wild West Show and the Peoria houses.

The Berean Bible Class, composed of forty men of the First Methodist Church, at Shelbyville, Ill., introduced two reels of moving pictures at the Sunday evening services.

Carl Rademacher, proprietor of the Lincoln Theater, at 1214 North Clark Street, Chicago, is said to be contemplating opening a moving picture theater in Woodstock, Ill.

The lease of Flanders and Sanderson having expired, Noble, Ill., is without a picture show.

THE STOLEN SYMPHONY

LUBI 2 Ree

A beautiful story of a poor young musician who has composed an exquisite symphony.

Adjoining his squalid quarters is a room occupied by a young lady of good family, but impoverished. She can l the wonderful strains of the symphony played by the young musician and becomes first interested in the music and then in with the composer. Together they plan to apprise the world of the genius. One evening, as a renowned musician is leavi concert hall, after one of his great successes, the young composer throws the score of the symphony into the carriage of great musician. Curiosity compels the musician to read the music and, at home, on his own instrument, he discovers the g work of the poor young composer. He adopts the symphony as his own and adds new laurels to his already great career. evening at a concert at which the symphony is played the real composer rises in the audience and denounces the player, cl ing the symphony as his. He is taken to prison and later put into an asylum. The young woman lover hears of his plight intercedes with a rich aunt to help secure his release. The aunt believes in the young composer and his work and conspire show the musician who has stolen the symphony in his true colors. She invites him to a musicale in her home and req him to play the symphony. As he is playing, the young composer, now released from the asylum, tears the score into pieces asks the musician to now play the symphony. Of course the musician cannot and acknowledges the young pauper compo wonderful genius. This is a thrilling play, beautifully set.

BILLY'S BURGLAR

TW REE

A daring capture of a notorious burglar by a brave boy. This is a thrill adventure in a fast speeding automobile and a funny predicament of a neglig policeman.

The Stars of the Vitagraph Company are cast very happily in this splen production.

Nov. 18 1912

KERRY GOW

KALEM 3 Reels

This is a play that the Kalem Company has gone to Ireland for and brought back with the true atmosphere every real characteristic of the Irish soil and Irish heart. The plot of the play is a regulation one, wherei villain's efforts are frustrated at every turn, and the story ends with him on his way to jail and the lovers paring for the wedding. The power and charm of the Kalem production lies in the romantic little by-play dear to the Irish heart, its humor and pathos. The Irish landscape is produced and the remarkable attenti details makes the picture a really great one. When you see the characters, you see just the kind that you v expect to meet on an Irish road or in an afternoon's journey through the country.

Nov. 15 1912

THE GROTTO OF TORTURE

PATHE 2 Reels

The persistence of an English lover wins him a bride from the recesses of a Hindoo temple, a woman knowing the punishment which will follow her action, still listens to her lover. Her whereabouts are unknown long time to the High Priest, but one day he finds her home and sees in its cradle her infant son. The H departs with a piece of the baby's wrap. This he uses to give the scent to a vicious leopard which is set fre hungrily picks out the trail back to the cradle of the child. At an open window beside the cradle a pair of glarin appear. They take in the room with one sweeping glance and the next instant the leopard has the child in its teet is gone.

The mother gives chase, and her husband with an armed guard boards an elephant and follows her trail. T mother tracks the leopard to the secret entrance to the Grotto of Torture. Only a moment she hesitates, then pl forward. She is instantly seized and lashed to a post amidst a weird collection of snakes and lizards. Her hu reaches the cave a few moments later and rescues the mother and infant child.

General

Features

KINGS OF THE FOREST

November 11, 1912. Two Reels.

A Wild Animal Sensation, by Selig, presenting a thrilling story of life in the Transvaal Jungles. This is one of the greatest animal pictures ever produced, and there are enough exciting moments, hairbreadth escapes and daring ventures to interest the most blase. This is a picture that is sure to attract and hold the interest of your patrons and to remain fresh for a long time in their memory.

THE MILLS OF THE GODS

November 4, 1912. Three Reels.

Signore Lorenzo, a very rich plebeian, seeks to dethrone Prince Gian of Milan. Lorenzo becomes enamored with Maria, a beautiful peasant girl, who repulses his attentions and is protected by Miguel, whom she soon marries. Through Lorenzo's influence they are driven from home into direct poverty, and Maria's death soon follows. Miguel later acquires wealth. Lorenzo's attempts to steal Miguel's beautiful daughter and usurp the throne are foiled, and he is betrayed by Tano, Miguel's servant, into a vacant house; the place is fired, and his life ground out by the Mills of the Gods. A Vitagraph production.

FRENZIED FINANCE

October 28, 1912. Three Reels.

A Pathe story. Claude Rodgers, a gambler, falls heir to a banking business. Rodgers immediately launches a "Get-rich-quick" scheme and starts a campaign to get depositors by promises of fabulous interest. The bank soon becomes the largest, although not the safest, in the East. But good things cannot last forever, and with his wife's sickness Rodgers' luck turns. A run on the bank is the next misfortune, and because of Rodgers' extravagance it cannot stand the strain. A mob of ruined depositors storms the home of the banker and finds that a bullet from his revolver has brought his reckless career to a close.

OLYMPIC GAMES

October 24, 1912. Three Reels.

Pathe shows World's greatest athletes in action at Stockholm meet.

THE LION TAMER'S REVENGE

October 21, 1912. Two Reels.

A Cines-Kleine Sensational Story. A story in which lions play an important part. A jealous lover, with the assistance of a clown, lures his rival and the girl into the den of lions. The woman manages to escape, later to accuse the murderer, but the lover is mangled to death by the infuriated lions.

THE COUNT OF MONTE CRISTO

October 14, 1912. Three Reels.

Selig Release. A wonderful and tragic story of Edmond Dantes, a young Frenchman, who is intrusted with a message to the exiled Napoleon on the Isle of Elba, forms one of the greatest themes ever written upon. There are over 300 people in the cast and shows the wonderful scenes, gorgeous costumes and elaborate stage setting. This is one of the most fascinating pictures ever produced by Selig.

AS YOU LIKE IT

October 7, 1912. Three Reels.

Vitagraph Company with Rose Coghlan in role of Rosalind, presents pretty Shakespeare play.

THE MAN HUNT

September 30, 1912. Two Reels.

A Pathe production, showing Kilborne, a poacher who is loved by Rose, the daughter of an old charwoman, whose cabin is in the dense forest. Kilborne is sought by the police and Rose, suspecting that he is at the house of a farmer whose daughter he is in love with, hurries to warn him of the impending danger. The police surround the house and as Kilborne steps through the door he is ordered to surrender; he refuses and the officer fires to kill him. Rose steps in front and receives the deadly bullet.

DAUGHTER OF THE SPY

September 16, 1912. Two Reels.

This is a Cines-Kleine release of a story of a spy who gives assistance in his home to a nobleman fleeing from the soldiers. The nobleman believes that his host and hostess have betrayed him and as he is taken to prison he denounces them for their duplicity. Heart-broken, the daughter determines to redeem herself by assisting the young nobleman to escape from prison. Trying to help the nobleman to escape the girl is killed by the sentry on the prison walls.

THE BLIGHTED SON

September 9, 1912. Four Reels.

A Pathe story of the dissipated life of the heir of a wealthy family. From one wild deed to another, the son wrecks the family fortunes and becomes a fugitive. After several years of hardships he endures, he develops the better side of his character and he returns to his home—a man.

FIRE AT SEA

August 26, 1912. Two Reels.

Another Pathe story of an old Sea Captain who is a slave to liquor. He is employed to sail a schooner with a cargo of gun powder for a revolutionary project. On the voyage the old Captain enters the powder chamber with a lighted pipe and the ship is blown up. A thrilling story of a wrecked ship afire at sea.

RIP VAN WINKLE

August 19, 1912. Two Reels.

A Vitagraph production of the famous legend of Rip Van Winkle, which is portrayed by that eminent actor Mr. Robert McWade, Sr., who was so long associated with the famous Joe Jefferson.

RAMESES, KING of EGYPT

August 12, 1912. Two Reels.

A production by Cines-Kleine of unparalleled magnificence, depicting a thrilling romance, laid in the days of ancient Egypt.

DON JUAN and CHARLES V

July 29, 1912. Two Reels.

The story of the love of a King for a beautiful Spanish maid, who is betrothed to Don Juan, a young student. Don Juan insults the young King, is arrested and his lover is brought to the torture chamber to see him suffer in the hope that in order to save him she will consent to marry the King. The father of the young King returns from a monastery to which he has retired and astounds the young men by telling them they are brothers. This is a Pathe reproduction.

SIEGE OF PETERSBURG

July 22, 1912. Two Reels.

A Kalem release telling a story of a young Confederate Officer who visits his betrothed and is interrupted by a young pauper and his crippled sister. The young pauper is given refuge and to show his appreciation the pauper enlists in the Confederate Army and proves himself a hero by saving the life of the officer, and in many other ways.

THE MONEY KINGS

July 15, 1912. Three Reels.

This is a Vitagraph story of a conspiracy on the part of the Money Kings to involve the United States in war. A precious document of the government is stolen by a woman who pretends to be infatuated with the young representative of the government who is on his way to the peace conference at The Hague. Afterwards, the young woman repents and attempts to make amends. A mine is exploded in the bay and there are many climaxes that make it a thrilling story.

THE ADOPTED CHILD

July 8, 1912. Two Reels.

A little child whose father is lost in a foreign country becomes bereft of her mother and is adopted by rag-pickers. When she reaches womanhood she falls in love with a young physician who is in turn loved by a young married woman. The woman's husband challenges the doctor to a duel and the latter recognizes in the outraged husband a remarkable resemblance to his little ward's father's photograph and thereby establishes her identity.

COMEDY REEL EVERY MONDAY

The Keystone Stock Company compriaes the largest aggregation of famous comedians in the world, the principals being Mack Sennett, Fred Mace, Mabel Normand, Ford Sterling, and Alice Davenport. It is an All-Star Company.

A SPLIT REEL—NOVEMBER 18

"THE RIVALS"

THIS is a dashing comedy, in which Mabel has two lovers, a good-natured fellow named Henry, and a conceited chap by the name of Fred. Fred is being favored, and she resorts to amusing schemes to get rid of Henry. Finally, however, she is held up by tramps and Fred escapes, leaving her to her fate. Rushing up, in an amusing encounter, Henry puts the hoboes to flight and wins Mabel's love.

"MR. FIXIT"

A BASHFUL lover listens to the plan of a friend and courts the girl by proxy. The friend takes presents and flowers to the young lady, but changes the cards so that she thinks he is the generous lover. He even arranges for a wedding and tells his trusting friend that everything is arranged, while he really means to marry the girl. The signal for Mr. Bashful to enter and claim his bride is to be the blowing of a whistle. The false friend loses the whistle, a small boy finds it and blows it, and Mr. Bashful rushes in in time to prevent the wedding, and wins the girl himself.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

CINES.

CAUGHT WITH THE GOODS (Nov. 19).—Horrors! Mrs. Stout discovers the photograph of an actress in her husband's pocket. As a punishment the culprit is forced to peel potatoes and do other tasks equally agreeable for the rest of the day.

Later, at the earnest request of the theater Manager, Mr. Stout, who is a prominent actor, is released upon his promise of "good behavior" and allowed to go to his work. Soon after he has departed, Mrs. Stout becomes anxious and decides to make sure that he keeps his word. The good woman arrives at the theater in time to see an act of "Anthony and Cleopatra."

All goes well until she believes that her husband is a little too realistic in bestowing his caresses. Rushing upon the stage, she "sails in," and things look bad for "Cleopatra" and some of the others until the firemen, who are called to the scene, turn the hose upon the rioters and literally wash them away.

THE MAGIC ELIXIR (Nov. 19).—Jenkins visits a gypsy, from whom he purchases a magic elixir guaranteed to protect him from all harm.

The dope certainly makes good its reputation, for, although Jenkins attempts to get into all the trouble possible, he finds that knives will not injure him, bullets are harmless, and even a cannon ball bounces off with no effect.

However, he soon meets with something not provided against in the draught, and falls an easy victim, much to his final discomfiture.

VITAGRAPH.

THE MODEL FOR ST. JOHN (Nov. 16).—The commission to paint the picture of St. John for one of the great Cathedrals is awarded to Monsieur Werner. The father recognizes in his son the attributes for the painting and soon the picture is completed.

Werner's son dissipates his time, money and substance in riotous living. Many years later, Artist Werner gets an order to paint the worst type of satanic depravity. He seeks for his model among the poor and outcast, until one day he comes across the semblance of a man with all the characteristics of beastiality and the brand of sin.

The last touches put upon the painting, the artist withdraws from the room. The poor sot, left alone, shuffles toward the canvas, looks at the portrayal of his features and is struck with horror. The artist returns and tries to quiet his model. At this moment, his eyes light upon a copy of the painting of St. John, for which he sat years ago. Beating his breast in terror, he cries, "I posed for that picture of St. John, the Divine!" In his delirium, the wretched sot falls dead. As the hand of the grim messenger smoothes the pallid features, the artist recognizes the semblance of his child.

ROMANCE OF A RICKSHAW (Nov. 19).—Mabel, the beautiful daughter of General Lewis, has considerable variety of her love affairs when she finds herself loved by Lieutenant Graham, of her father's staff, and very much sought after by a rich Indian Rajah, whom she meets at a garden party. The Rajah proposes, but is refused. He abducts her. Dennis, Graham's servant, meets the abductors and picks up Mabel's locket, which she drops. He hastens to the Lieutenant and tells him what he saw.

Graham, with Dennis, and another soldier, determine to rescue Mabel from the hands of the Rajah. They go to his palace, find the rickshaw in which she was abducted and some Hindoo raiment. They disguise themselves; Dennis making up as a Hindoo Medicine Doctor. They gain entrance to the Rajah's presence. Dennis, with incantations and salutations, demands the presence of the foreign maiden whom they have in their midst. When Mabel appears, Lieutenant Graham draws a brace of revolvers from the folds of his robe and, taking the Rajah and his attendants unawares, they hurry from the room, place Mabel in the rickshaw which they had left at the door and are far on their way to the Military Post before the astonished Rajah can follow in pursuit. Safely reaching General Lewis's headquarters, Mabel is placed in her father's arms. The General acknowledges Graham's courage and gladly consents to his and Mabel's marriage.

TIMID MAY (Nov. 20).—May arrives at the Bullshed Ranch. She is so timid and shy that she is almost frightened to death by the cowboys' revolvers and rough appearance.

While all the other boys consider her a joke, Steve, a good-natured fellow, thinks she is just about right. Shortly after her arrival, there is a reward offered for the capture of a desperado. The sheriff, her uncle, and his men start in pursuit. Steve accidentally happens to get in his way, and both he and the desperado are so surprised they separate in opposite directions. May sees the desperado approaching her. The bad man appeals to her for refuge. She tells him to go in the barn, which is also used as a jail by the sheriff. She locks him in, and when the sheriff and his men return, they find their man in jail, thanks to Timid May.

Steve, scared to death, arrives on the scene before the posse, and when they arrive takes part of the credit. May is so bashful and so overcome by his assumed heroism, she falls into his arms and throws darts of love into his soul.

DARKTOWN DUEL (Nov. 20).—"She sho' is some belle," and no wonder she provokes a quarrel between Eph Johnson and Rastus Simpson, who are rivals for her hand. "Since we cannot fight with weapons, I challenge you to a watermelon duel, the winner takes the lady," says Rastus to Eph. The contest is arranged, and the duel begins. They certainly punish the watermelons.

The lady in question is present. Simpson wins and she makes her decision to him in the following note. "Dear Mr. Simpson: I shall accept your rival. I admire your courage, but I never could support a man that eats like you. Maria Jones."

THE SERVANT PROBLEM (Nov. 22).—A complete story of this subject was given in the review written by Louis Reeves Harrison on page 327 of our issue dated October 26, under the old title of "How Mr. Bullington Ran the House."

WILD PAT (Nov. 23).—Neglectful of his little home and family, Pat resorts to evil companions at the town tavern. The priest of the village gives him a strong lecture. On the priest's advice, he goes to America, leaving a solemn promise with Mary that he will never touch liquor again. He finds employment as a stoker in the boiler room of a large factory. One day he receives a letter from Mary in which she tells him that a little girl has arrived to bless their union. Pat is delighted, and while sitting in the engine room dreaming of home, the men in the boiler room, who have been drinking, pile too much coal in the furnaces, and an explosion is imminent. They flee from the room. Pat, seeing the escaping steam, hastens below, enters the boiler room, turns the safety valve and avoids a disastrous explosion. In this act of heroism, he is so badly scalded he dies in the arms of his sympathetic co-workers, after taking Mary's letter from the bosom of his shirt and kissing it in fond remembrance of her. The good priest breaks the news to his family.

SIX O'CLOCK (Nov. 21).—On the verge of financial ruin, Mr. Cameron has got to raise a large sum of money. His partner promises to raise it by six o'clock that evening and telephone him as soon as he has secured it. Jimmy Cameron, his little boy, has turned the hands of the clock half an hour ahead, so that his music lesson may be shortened by that much time. After a terrible ordeal of suspense, Mr. Cameron calmly prepares for suicide in case of failure. At 5.30 his partner closes the deal for the money and rushes to telephone Cameron. A few minutes before this, as the clock's hands point to two minutes to six, Jimmy remembers his indolent deed and turns the hands of the clock back half an hour, to the right time. This is the only thing that saves his father's life.

When Mr. Cameron hears the telephone, he is stricken with heart-failure, brought on by his anxiety and overwrought nerves. His partner not being able to reach Cameron by telephone, hastily arrives at his home and finds him unconscious. With the assistance of a physician, he is revived and his partner tells him of his success in securing the necessary amount to avoid the crisis.

LUBIN.

THE GOOD FOR NOTHING (Nov. 18).—Having failed at literature in the city, Dick Evans returns home to take up farm work again. His father sneers at his wasted career, and his mother, Rosabel, and the minister are his only comforters. Rosabel is his sweetheart, and postmaster Jordan's daughter. Her father hears of Dick's return, and when Dick goes to see Rosabel he is shown the door. Dick later passes the office of the "Citizen," a newspaper. The plant is for sale cheap. Rev. John Brower lends Dick the money to buy the plant. To the surprise of his father and the postmaster, Dick becomes an editor. Dick "gets back" at his father and the postmaster. The latter wants another term, and Dick suggests in an editorial that what the town needs is another postmaster. Dick's father runs for Mayor. Dick decides to run against him. Dick has paid back his debt to the minister, and is ready to marry Rosabel. He makes his election sure by getting the trolley people to run an electric line into the town, instead of passing through a rival village. Then Dick goes to the minister with an advance copy of the "Citizen," and discloses his climax. Brower reads the editorial and approves with delight. Rosabel's father reads it and grabbing his hat, drags Rosabel to the Evans farmhouse. Dick's father is despondent because Dick is going to "beat him out" at the election, but Jordan shows him the paper and his gloom is turned to joy. Dick has resigned from the mayoralty campaign in favor of his father, and also has turned in favor of the present postmaster. And it is all over but the wedding ceremony.

A FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE (Nov. 19).—George Rand and his wife are living in a cabin situated near his claim on the mountain side. One day Jim Slater, a bandit, is located by the Sheriff. The Sheriff fires, wounding Slater in the arm. He runs until he comes to the cabin of the Rands. He tells them a fictitious tale of injustice, and they decide to protect him. When the Sheriff calls Rand informs him that he has seen no one pass that answers the description. That night Slater steals Rand's gun and hat and sneaks out. A month passes and Slater is almost forgotten by the little family, but one morning Mrs. Rand, when counting up her little savings, sees a face at the window. Ie is Slater, but the rough beard covering his face prevents her from recognizing him. Rushing to the window he breaks the glass, puts his revolver through and commands Mrs. Rand to open the door. She does and he enters the cabin. Rand had forgotten his water bottle that morning and returns to his cabin for it. Upon his arrival he finds his wife holding the outlaw at bay with the gun she managed to get from his holster. The young wife goes for the Sheriff, and Slater is soon in the hands of the posse. Later the Sheriff brings them their well-earned reward.

LOVE AND TREACHERY (Nov. 21).—In a fishing village dwells Marie, a fisher maiden, who is loved by Jean and Jacques. Jacques meeting Marie one day proposes marriage to her, but is refused. Happening to pass Jean's cabin, Jacques sees Marie in Jean's arms. Jacques meets the coast guard, who tells him that smugglers are about. This puts an idea in Jacques' mind, and he with his pal Francois, starts to put it into execution. They go to Jean's cabin and take Jean's hat and coat. Then he and Francois go where they have a boat moored and Jacques puts on the stolen clothes. A coast guard sees the launching of the boat, and recognizing Jean's coat and hat, becomes suspicious of Jean. Jacques and Francois proceed to their cave, as they are smugglers. Arriving at the cave they get a bundle of lace which has been smuggled and returning to Jean's cabin they cut off several yards and place it in the pocket of Jean's coat. They leave the cabin and are returning to the cave when they meet the captain of the coast guards. They inform him that Jean is a smuggler. The captain and his guards arrive at Jean's cabin. The captain accuses Jean of smuggling. He is placed under arrest. Francois and Jacques gloating over their success, return to the cave and are making a division of their spoils when a quarrel ensues and Jacques insults Francois. Francois leaves the cave. He runs to Jean's cabin and tells Marie how the affair was accomplished, and they start after the captain and the guard. Overtaking them, Francois tells the captain. The whole party then proceed to the cave where Jacques is. After surrounding the cave with guards, the captain, Marie and Jean go inside. Jacques is accused and denies, but when Francois appears and confronts him with the balance of the lace he is arrested.

THE DRUMMER (Nov. 22).—Anthony Brown starts on an extended trip. He meets in the next town a lady who is an old acquaintance and who invites him on a shopping trip. She makes a number of purchases and discovering she has more than can carry, he decides to put home of them in his suitcase. They go but a short distance when she suddenly remembers an engagement, and after apologizing, hustles away, forgetting the bundles in the suitcase. After reaching his hotel Brown finding he has little use for his suitcase decides to ship it home, forgetting about the bundles. When later he calls at the tennis courts the young lady reminds him of the bundles. He is in a frenzy of horror at the idea of his wife finding the lady's bundles and rushes away to intercept the suitcase, but finds it is already on its way. He follows and on reaching home he is greatly surprised to have wife and mamma greet him so lovingly, they thinking the articles are intended for wife's birthday.

TAMING THEIR PARENTS (Nov. 22).—Mr. Abbot and his son Billy are both in the habit of visiting Mrs. Pierce and her daughter, Dorothy. One evening Mrs. Pierce sees Mr. Abbot rudely push her pet kitten from the chair that he may sit down. She later serves tea, when he insists on two lumps of sugar instead of one. She loses her temper and an argument ensues, culminating in the young people being torn from each other's arms and the elders parting in anger. Billy and Dorothy confide their troubles to their friends, who conspire to adjust matters. They kidnap the elders, blindfold them, and turn them loose in a darkened room. When the light is turned on they indulge in mutual recrimination until they are persuaded by the young people to make up. Billy and Dorothy elope, and at the finish of the ceremony Mr. Abbot and Mrs. Pierce are brought in. They forgive and are married and all four depart on their honeymoon.

THE SILENT SIGNAL (Nov. 23).—Major Carews, in command of a squadron of cavalry near El Paso on the Mexican border, receives a visit from his daughter, Lucile. The Major greets her and she meets his adjutant, Lieutenant Gilmore. They become very friendly, so much so that when she amusedly receives the attentions of one Jose Montero, of the Mexican Junta, Gilmore resents it. She laughs at him. Later, Jose, becoming too strenuous in his importunities, Lucile makes him ridiculous by shoving a kitten in his face as he is about to kiss her. Enraged, he stalks away and meets the half-breed, Buck, on the trail near the camp. More or less beside himself with humiliation, he vents his rage on the half-breed, attempting to take his horse away from him. Lucile sees the encounter and rushes to the rescue of Buck. Jose then turns his attentions to the girl, attempting to kiss her and would succeed but for the timely arrival of Gilmore, who knocks him down. Vowing vengeance Jose crosses the border and enlisting the services of some Mexican outlaws returns and succeeds in capturing Gilmore together with the half-breed, Buck, who unwittingly stumbled on the outlaw band. Buck is forced to cook for the outlaws. While doing so he manages to send up a series of smoke signals and thus smokegraphs their plight to the U. S. camp. Lucile, to whom Buck has taught the smoke code, sees and reads the message. She informs her father, who orders a troop of U. S. cavalry to the rescue. The rescue is made after a spectacular chase and fight through the mountains and Lucile is once more happy in the arms of her lover.

KALEM.

THE KERRY GOW (Nov. 18).—A descriptive review of this three-reel special subject as written by W. Stephen Bush was published on page 530 of our issue of November 9th.

STRONG ARM NELLIE (Nov. 18).—Nellie was athletic. She advocated boxing, fencing and riding as a tonic. But Dad could not see it. He especially objected to her boxing, as the rattle of the punching bag disturbed his afternoon siesta. One night a couple of burglars visited the house. Nellie heard a noise in the dining-room, quietly crept down stairs, and with a left upper-cut to one and a straight arm blow to the other, she made the marauders take the count. Dad was forced to admit that there is something to an athletic training.

THE LANDLUBBER (Nov. 18).—Polly, the fisherman's daughter, is in love with Ned, the village photographer, but her father is bitterly opposed to landlubbers. Ned has an inspiration. He calls on Polly's father and tells him he has decided to become a sailor. He is given an opportunity to prove his worth but he hardly fills the bill. The next day Polly induces her father to have his picture taken. The clever photographer arranges with a sailor to dress as a woman and quietly seat himself beside father when the latter has been "posed." When the camera snaps, the accomplice slips away. How Ned threatens to show the picture to the fisherman's wife and brings about a consent to the marriage makes a laughable finale.

THE TELLTALE MESSAGE (Nov. 20).—Two sisters, hearing of robberies in the neighborhood, decide to take their valuables to the residence of Newman, a banker, for safe-keeping. The banker is very obliging and places the money and jewelry in his private safe.

That same evening Newman gives his valet permission to visit his home overnight. While the servant is away, Newman plots with his lodgekeeper to rob the safe, it being his plan to give out the report that burglars have broken in. The valet, arriving home, finds his folks are away. He therefore returns to Newman's and quietly enters the house while the robber is at work. He grapples with the thief but the latter makes his escape, leaving behind one of his coat buttons.

The next morning the sisters are advised of the robbery and being dissatisfied with Newman's explanation, they employ a detective to make an investigation. The valet shows the button he has secured, which furnishes a clue as the detective notices that one of the lodgekeeper's coat buttons is missing, and the accomplice is arrested. Fearing the lodgekeeper will expose him, Newman writes a warning note and places it in an egg. When a basket of food is brought to the prisoner, the detective examines the egg, locates the message and brings the unscrupulous banker to justice.
